misses the fine delicacy of the Writer, implying that the dulness which he deprecates was indeed commenced, but might be broken off. Compare ch. v. 11, where they are said to have become dull of hearing—the same adjective in the Greek. It is true that there is no contradiction between the two verses—the one being of sluggishness in hearing, the other in Christian practice), sluggish, but (this again brings in a strong contrast—"nay, but rather:" passing to another subject altogether, as it were. See on ch. ii. 6) imitators of them who through faith and endurance (see Col. i. 11, also ver. 15; James v. 7, 8. That constant and patient waiting is implied, without which faith would be made void: of which it is said, "It is good that a man should both hope and wait for the salvation of the Lord") inherit the promises (what is meant by this, and who are indicated by the expression? The two questions are very closely connected together. First observe that the verb is not past, who . . . inherited, but present: said not of any one act by which these persons entered on the inheritance of the promises, but of (1) a state now going on, "who are inheriting," or (2) in mere predication, "who are inheritors of." That the first cannot be meant, is clear: for in ch. xi. where he enumerates the examples of faith and patience, he says, "These all . . . received not the promise." The same consideration would prevent the reference very commonly here supposed, to Abraham and the patriarchs. Taking then (2), we may regard the designation as used without reference to time, but as indicative of office, or standing, or privilege. Thus the reference of the words will be perfectly general: not, who have inherited, nor who shall inherit, nor who are inheriting, but "who are inheritors of," who inherit, in all times and under all circumstances. Of these, Abraham is chosen as the most illustrious example). 13–20.] The encouragement to perseverance is further confirmed by God's express oath made to

Abraham, the first inheritor of the promise.

13.] For "in these words he does not render a reason why we should imitate those just mentioned, but a reason why he mentions them. A man might ask whether there are any such, and who they are? So in these words he introduces Abraham, the father of all the faithful, who was most enduring in his faith, and reaped most fruit from it." Schlichting) God when He promised (Bleek well remarks, that promised is to be taken not only as "made a promise," but in the Messianic sense, "gave the promise," as "the promises" above, and vv. 15, 17, ch. vii. 6; Rom. ix. 4; Gal. iii. 16) to Abraham, since He could swear by none (no person) greater, swore by Himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless (at first the participle, in this expression, seems to have had a certain emphasis: but afterwards this was lost, and the expression became a mere formula) thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. And thus (i.e. when he had received this promise,—being in this state of dependence on the divine promise), having endured with patience (viz. in his waiting so long for God's promise to be fulfilled—in having, when it was partially fulfilled, again shewn noble endurance in the will of God by offering up Isaac), he obtained the promise (i.e. not as Bleek, he had made to him the promise above related: this would merely stultify the sentence, which proceeds on the faithfulness of God, confirming his promise with an oath by Himself, and the faith and endurance of Abraham, waiting for that promise to be fulfilled: but as Lünemann, he obtained, got fulfilled to him, the promise, the thing promised, to wit, the birth of Isaac, as the commencement of the fulfilment—as much of it as he could see. And thus Abraham became inheritor of the promises. That there is here no inconsistency with ch. xi. 39, see shewn there).

16—20.] Security of this promise, as being part of God's great promise, which He has fulfilled in Christ. These verses are transitional, and lead us to the consideration of the Melchisedec Priesthood of our Lord in the next chapter.

16.] For [indeed] men (emphatic) swear by the greater [one] (undoubtedly masculine: it could not be predicated of any thing neuter, that it was greater than the men who swear. And by the expression here, generally taken, must be meant God Himself: that greater One, who is above all men): and an oath is to them an end (see reff. and more examples in Bleek) of all gainsaying (A. V. with very many other versions, "strife," which is a legitimate meaning, but not borne out here by the context, seeing that there is no allusion, in the application of the example, to any instance in which God and men were at strife. And besides, in the only places where the word occurs in the New Test. it has the meaning "gainsaying:" e.g. ch. vii. 7, without possibility of gainsaying. So that it is best to take this meaning here, and understand that an oath puts an end to all gainsaying by confirming the matter one way, in which all parties consent) for confirmation (the A. V. ungrammatically joins these words with an oath,—"an oath for confirmation." They can only be joined, and that closely, with an end. Calvin's remark on this verse is pertinent: "This passage teaches us that there is among Christians a lawful use of an oath, and this is to be noticed as against fanatics, who of their own fancy want to abrogate the rule of reverent swearing which God has prescribed in His law. For the Apostle beyond doubt here treats of the manner of swearing as of a pious practice and one sanctioned by God: inas-

And thus when He Himself swears, having no greater to swear by, He swears by Himself, so making Himself as it were a third person between the parties to the oath) with an oath (the instrument: it was by means of the oath that He exercised the office of interposer or Mediator): that by means of two ("what two?" says Chrysostom: and replies, "the saying and promising, the adding an oath to His promise." The Writer is impressing on us the strength of that method of assurance which God has been pleased to give us, in that He has not only promised [in both cases in question], but also confirmed it by an oath) unchangeable things, in which (as the material of the lie, if it were possible) it is impossible for God ever (this force is given by the original construction, which distributes the propo-

A saying is attributed to Socrates, "A ship is not to be held by one anchor, nor life by one hope"), safe and firm (the adjectives belong to anchor, not to "which [hope].") An anchor may be unsafe and unsteady, as well as safe and firm), and entering into the part within the veil (first, to what is entering in to be referred? to the anchor, or to the hope? The former is the more obvious construction: and has been accepted by many, thus explaining it: "As a ship's anchor does not fasten in the water, but enters the earth beneath the water, and there fixes: so our hope, the anchor of the soul, thinks it not enough to enter the vestibule, i. e. is not content with earthly and visible blessings, but penetrates even to those things which are within the veil, even into the very Holy of Holies: i. e. lays hold of God Himself, and heavenly blessings, and fixes on them." Estius. This is said by Bleek to be too artificial, and he, with some others, takes hope as that which enters within the veil, simply, the figure being dropped. But I must say that I prefer the other, being as it seems to me the simpler view. "Two figures are here not so much mixed, as wonderfully combined. The Writer might have compared the world to a sea, the soul to a ship, the future yet hidden glory to the concealed bottom of the deep, the far off terra firma, stretching away under the water and covered by it. Or, he might have compared the present earthly life with the forecourt, and the future blessedness with the heavenly sanctuary which is concealed from us as by a veil. But he has combined both these. The Soul clings, as one in fear of shipwreck, to an anchor, and sees not whither the cable of the anchor runs,—where it is fastened: but she knows, that it is fastened behind the veil which hides the future glory, and that she, if she only holds on to the anchor, shall in her time be drawn in where it is, into the holiest place, by the hand of the Deliverer." Ebrard. This is very beautiful, and in the main, simple and natural: only going off into fancy at the end,—which is not required for the interpretation. The word here used was the name for the second veil or curtain [ch. ix. 3], which shut in the Holy of Holies; the first or outer one being called by another name, where as forerunner (not "the forerunner," as A. V.) on our behalf (as representing, and introducing, us, who are to come after. It is a figure analogous, in its propriety, to that where our Lord is described as firstfruits of them that slept, firstborn of the dead, in theirs. And it is one full of comfort to us: for, as Theophylact says, "A forerunner must be so with reference to some that follow, and there is not generally any entire difference between the forerunner and his followers, as neither was there between John and Christ. Be not then faint-hearted: we shall very soon enter where our forerunner has entered") entered Jesus, having become (see on ch. ii. 17) a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec (the stress is on these last words. And this is so, because it is this particular point to which the Writer wishes to return in what follows. He assumes for the present the eternal priesthood as conceded, and takes up the mysterious point which he left at ch. v. 10, for elucidation. And thus ends the digression which began there).

CHAP. VII. 1—X. 18.] THE HIGH PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST AFTER THE ORDER OF MELCHISEDEC, SET FORTH IN ITS DISTINCTION FROM THE LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD:—THE NEW COVENANT BROUGHT IN BY CHRIST, IN ITS DISTINCTION FROM THE OLD:—AND THE FULL PROPITIATION WROUGHT BY HIM, IN DISTINCTION FROM THE PROPITIATORY SACRIFICES FORMERLY OFFERED. And herein, VII. 1—10.] The priesthood of Melchisedec: its nature, as eternal (1—3; as superior to the Levitical (4—10). 1—3.] For this Melchisedec, king of Salem (Gen. xiv. 18. It is doubtful whether this Salem is a short form of Jerusalem, or some other place. Those who hold the latter opinion contend that Jerusalem cannot be meant, because Jebus, and not Salem, was its old name, and Salem for Jerusalem occurs only in Ps. lxxvi. 2, a song of late date,—and there as a poetical form, for the rhythm's sake. A prose writer of the primitive date of Genesis would not be likely to use such a form. They therefore suppose that this Salem was that mentioned John iii. 23 as near to Enon, where John baptized: probably also in Gen. xxxiii. 18, where the Septuagint, Vulgate, and A. V. all recognize Salem as the name of a place, though the Targumists, Josephus, &c., regard it as an adjective. The same place seems to be mentioned in Judith iv. 4, the valley of Salem. And for this view, there is very ancient and weighty authority. Jerome says that he had heard from the most learned Jews, "that Salem is not, as Josephus and all our people suppose, a name of Jerusalem, but a town near Scythopolis, which is called Salem to this day." And he goes on to say, that the palace of Melchisedec was shewn there, betokening by the magnitude of the ruins that of the ancient fabric. And Bleek, from whom

this notice is mainly taken, argues with some probability that the Writer of our Epistle can hardly have thought of Jerusalem as indicated by Salem, or he would have pressed, not merely the etymology of the name, but all those sacerdotal associations which belonged to the holy city. As to the further question, whether Salem is here, or by Philo, meant as the name of a place at all, see on ver. 2), priest of God the most high (so in Genesis. The appellation, here and in the Old Test., belongs to the true and only God: see Gen. xiv. 19, 22, where in this same history both Melchisedec and Abraham speak of "the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth." The union of the kingly and priestly offices in one belonged to the simplicity of patriarchal times, and is found in Abraham himself, who offers sacrifice; see Gen. xv. and xxii. Remember the prophetic announcement Zech. vi. 13, so familiar to every Christian. Our beloved Saviour, as the "Father of the age to come" (so the Septuagint, Isa. ix. 6, where we have "the Everlasting Father"), restores again that first blessed family relation, which sin had disturbed), who met Abraham (it was, as the narrative in Gen. literally stands, the king of Sodom, who came out to meet Abraham: but Melchisedec is mentioned in the same sentence as having brought forth bread and wine, and must be included in the category of those who came out to meet him also) returning from the defeat of the kings, and blessed him (Gen. ver. 19: see the argument below, vv. 6, 7); to whom also Abraham apportioned a tenth of all ("of all," viz. the booty which he had taken from the kings: see ver. 4 below. In the narrative, the whole has the solemnity of a formal act; of sacerdotal blessing on the part of Melchisedec, and recognition of him as High Priest of God on the part of Abraham. The custom of setting apart the tenth to divine uses, was heathen as well as Jewish.

So far (see the

summary above) is purely historical: now follow the inductions from the history; from the mystical office and name of the Person concerned; first indeed being interpreted (i.e. "being by interpretation:" his name bearing this meaning when translated into Greek) King of righteousness (or righteous king, as Josephus gives it. But the other form here is no doubt purposely chosen, inasmuch as Melchisedec is a prophetic symbol of Him who is not only righteous, but the fount and ground of all righteousness before God. Zech. ix. 9; Isa. ix. 7; Jer. xxiii. 5, 6; Dan. ix. 24; Mal iv. 2; 1 Cor. i. 30), and next also ("being," not "being interpreted," must be supplied. This is plain from "King of Salem" representing a matter of fact, and the interpretation following) King of Salem, which is, King of peace (it has been much disputed, whether Salem is regarded by the Writer as the name of a town at all, and is not rather a portion of the personal appellation of Melchisedec. This latter has been held by Bleek, mainly from the consideration that no distinction here is made between the two expressions, "King of righteousness," and "King of peace." But, as Bleek himself confesses, we may well imagine that the Writer may wish to point out as a remarkable fact, that the city over which Melchisedec reigned, as well as his own name, was of typical significance; and in that case does not the expression and after that also draw sufficient distinction between his personal appellation and that of his city? As regards the word itself, peace is here used in that pregnant and blessed sense in which Christ is said to be "Prince of peace," Isa. ix. 6; see also Rom. v. 1; Eph. ii. 14, 15, 17; Col. i. 20. It is peace as the fruit of righteousness, compare Isa. xxxii. 17: notice the order here, first . . . of righteousness, and after that also of peace. "Righteousness and peace," says Delitzsch, "form in Old Test. prophecy, the characteristic of the times of the Messiah"); without father, without mother, without genealogy (it is very difficult to assign the true meaning to these predicates. The latter of them seems indeed to represent a simple matter of fact: viz. that Melchisedec has not in Genesis any genealogy recorded, by which his descent is shewn [see below]. But as to the two former, it cannot well be denied that, while they also may bear a similar sense, viz., that no father and mother of his are recorded in the sacred narrative, it is very possible on the other hand to feel that the Writer would hardly have introduced them so solemnly, hardly have followed them up by such a clause as "having neither beginning of days nor end of life," unless he had coupled with them far higher ideas than the former supposition implies. I confess this feeling to be present in my own mind:—indeed I feel that such solemn words seem to me to decide against that other supposition. So far I think all is clear: but when we come to inquire what high and mysterious eminence is here allotted to Melchisedec, I own I have no data whereon to decide: nor, I think, is a decision required of us. The Writer assigns to him this mysterious and insulated position, simply as a type of Christ: and this type he is merely by virtue of negations, as far as these epithets are concerned: in what he was not, he surpasses earthly priests, and represents Christ: what he was, is not in the record. I would regard the epithets then as designedly used in this mysterious way, and meant to represent to us, that Melchisedec was a person differing from common men. It remains to give a summary of the opinions respecting the passage. The circumstance that Melchisedec is here stated to be likened unto the Son of God, has led many of the older expositors to regard these epithets as belonging to Melchisedec only in so far as he is a type of the Son of God, and as properly true of Him alone, not of Melchisedec, or only in an improper sense, and a subordinate manner. Accordingly, they understand without father of Christ in reference to his Humanity; without mother, in reference to his Divinity; and so also without genealogy. But, however the term "without father" might perhaps be conceded to be not unnaturally applied to Christ in virtue of his Humanity, the words "without mother" and "without genealogy" lie so far off any obvious application to his Divinity, that we may safely say this view could not well have been in the Writer's mind. See further reasons, on the words "likened to the Son of God" below, for applying these epithets to Melchisedec, and not to Christ. But when they are so applied, we are met by two widely divergent streams of opinion, partly hinted at in the explanation of the rendering given above. The one of these regards Melchisedec as a superhuman being: the other finds nothing in this description which need point him out as any thing beyond a man. Jerome had received from Evagrius an anonymous work, in which the "most famous question respecting the Priest Melchisedec" was treated, and the writer tried to prove him "to have been of divine nature, not to be thought of as a man: and to have at the end presumed to say that the Holy Spirit met Abraham, and was the person who appeared to him as a man." This strange opinion moved Jerome "to examine the books of the ancients to see what their opinions were." And he found that Origen, in his first Homily on Genesis [now lost], maintained him to have been an angel, as did Didymus, the follower of Origen. Then he examined Hippolytus, Eusebius of Casarea, and Eusebius of Emesa, Apollinarius, Eustathius of Antioch, and found that all these held him to have been a man of Canaan, King of Jerusalem, and endeavoured to prove it in different ways. He then mentions the opinion of the Jews, that Melchisedec was Shem, the eldest son of Noah; and gives their calculation that this may well have been, for Shem survived Abraham forty years. On this he pronounces no opinion. The view, that Melchisedec was the Holy Ghost, was also entertained by Hieracas the Egyptian, and by a branch of the Theodotian heretics, founded by a younger Theodotus, and called Melchisedecites: and Marcus Eremita [about 400], who wrote a treatise on Melchisedec, mentions heretics who believed him to be "God the Word, before He took flesh, or was born of Mary." This opinion Epiphanius mentions as held by some within the church: and Ambrose, from his remarks, vol. i. p. 288, seems to have held this: though, as above, he expressly states him to have been merely a holy man, a type of Christ. This last view was ever the prevalent one in the church. Cyril of Alexandria combats the two opinions that Melchisedec was a vision of the Holy Spirit, and that he was a great angel.

In later times the idea that he was the Son of God has been revived. The theory that he was Shem has found many advocates: among others, Luther [on Gen. xv.] and Melancthon. Jurien believes him to have been Ham; Hulse and Calmet to have been Enoch reappearing on earth), having neither beginning of days, nor end of life (these words are again taken by most Commentators to mean, that of Melchisedec, neither beginning of days nor end of life are related in Scripture. Some take beginning for that of his sacerdotal life: others take end also for that of his priestly life: "for that no one preceded him in the priesthood to which he succeeded, and no one is related to have succeeded him in his priesthood, in which thing he was a type of Christ." Camero. But however the end of his life may be legitimately thus referred, seeing that his priesthood and his life would expire together, his beginning of days can hardly be understood of any thing but his natural life, especially as following his being without father or mother, and in the presence of the general biblical usage of the days of any one as a man's lifetime. Accordingly most expositors take the words in this their natural sense and interpret them as above. Again however, no one, I think, can help feeling that such an interpretation is in fact no worthy acceptance of these solemn words of the sacred Writer. The expressions become incomparably more natural, as Bleek says, if the Writer really mean that Melchisedec had not, as mortal men, a definite beginning and end of his life. It really would seem to me almost childish, to say thus solemnly of any whose acts were related in the Old Test., but whose birth and death were not related, that they had neither beginning of days nor end of life. Suppose e.g. such a thing were said of Hobab, father-in-law of Moses. Here again Delitzsch, who takes strongly the other view, quotes from Philo an expression respecting Cain which he supposes analogous: "Cain, the symbol of evil, shall not die, because evil must always live among the mortal race of men." But surely it is hardly legitimate to conclude that, because Philo means only thus much, the Writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews means no more; but (yea, rather) likened to the Son of God (this clause stands alone and pendent, like the preceding, and must not be taken with "abideth a priest for ever." To this there are three objections: 1) it would be extremely unnatural to say that from a text where it is said that the Son of God is a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec, Melchisedec himself derives the character of remaining a priest for ever: 2) it would be but a poor way of proving the eternal priesthood of Christ, to shew that He is a priest after the order of one who only appeared to have, but really had not, such eternal priesthood: and 3) it is clearly not in respect of priesthood that the being made like is here meant, but in respect of the foregoing predicates: for it is as to these only that the Son of God would be an archetype for Melchisedec, seeing that, in respect of priesthood, Melchisedec, was chronologically prior to our Lord. The sense is then that Melchisedec, in being "without father, without mother, without genealogy, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life," personally, not typically, resembles the Son of God—in his personal attributes, as the Son of God subsequently in His incarnation, resembled him in His priesthood); remaineth priest for ever (the expression is one which must be interpreted in each case by the context in which it occurs. There is no reason why here, where an eternal priesthood is in question, it should mean for life: indeed such meaning would be absurd, seeing that all were priests for life. All kinds of ways have been devised to escape the plain assertion of these words. Most Commentators have had recourse to the same as before, viz. that no end of his priesthood is related to us in Scripture: so Ecumenius, Theophylact, Cyril of Alexandria, Epiphanius, and many moderns. Schlichting takes it, that as our Lord's High Priesthood, which is said to be eternal, will endure to that time when the high-priestly office will cease, so Melchisedec's priesthood is said

Tholuck, "He remains, in so far as the type remains in the antitype, in so far as his priesthood remains in Christ." But thus type and antitype are hopelessly confounded. Christ is to be proved to be a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. Can we conceive then that the Writer, in setting forth what the order and attributes of Melchisedec are, should go back to Christ to find them? Again, to shew to what shifts interpreters have been reduced here, others actually understand "who" before "abideth," and construe, "made like to the Son of God, who, abideth, &c." Every thing shews that which has been maintained all through this difficult passage, that the assertions are made, and this chief one is above all made, simply of Melchisedec, and they are, as matters of fact, inferred and laid down by the sacred Writer from the historic notices of him. What further inference lies from such dignity being here put on Melchisedec, is not, as I before said, for us to enquire: certainly, none which can in any way interfere with Christ's eternal and sole priesthood, can be correct. It is one of those things in which we must not be wise above that which is written, but must take simply and trustingly the plain sense of our Bibles on a deep and mysterious subject, and leave it for the day when all shall be clear, to give us full revelation on the matter).

4—10.] See summary at ver. 1. The Melchisedec priesthood greater than the Levitical, shewn by the fact that Melchisedec received tithes of Abraham and blessed him (4—8), and potentially, in Abraham, Levi (9, 10). 4.] But observe how great (of what dignity and personal excellence) this man [was] (let it be noticed that the argument still puts forward the personal dignity of Melchisedec, in a way quite inconsistent with the commonly received interpretation of the predicates above), to whom Abraham paid tithes also (went so far as to pay tithes), from the best [of the spoil] (literally, that which comes from the top of an heap, and so the firstfruits. And in consequence, some have pressed here the proper meaning, and understood, that Abraham gave to Melchisedec the tenth of that portion of the spoil which was already set apart for God. But, considering that these words merely take up the tenth part of all, ver. 2, and of Genesis, it is more natural to understand the spoils in a wider and less proper sense, of the booty itself, as indeed all booty brought away might be considered as the firstfruits, the choice part, in contradistinction to the more worthless portion which was left behind), the patriarch (added at the end of the sentence to emphasize the title: and he, the illustrious patriarch).

5.] Continuation of ver. 4, setting forth the reason of this greatness. And indeed (the A. V. "and verily," is rather too strong) they of the sons of Levi who receive the priesthood (or, and perhaps more properly, "they of the sons of Levi, when they receive the priesthood?" in either case meaning the family of Aaron, not the whole tribe of Levi, which indeed was appointed by God to receive tithes, see Numb. xviii. 20: the words they of the sons of Levi will not admit of this interpretation. The Writer speaks of the custom, whereby not all the Levites, but the priests only, received tithes), have commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law (the commandment referred to, on the ordinary construction of the first words of the verse, would be Numb. xviii. 20—32. But it seems more natural to understand those first words as I have given them in the alternative there, and then according to the law falls into its place easily

"Those of the sons of Levi, when they are invested with the priesthood, receive commandment to tithe the people according to the law"), that is, of their brethren, though [they be] come out of the loins of Abraham (the meaning is very difficult to assign. I take this to be intended: by the first clause, that is, of their brethren, that the Levitical tithe right was all within the limits of one race, a privilege enjoyed by sons of Abraham over sons of Abraham, and therefore less to be wondered at, and involving less difference between man and man, than the tithe right of Melchisedec over Abraham, one of different race, and indeed over all his progeny with him. Then the second clause, though they be come out of the loins of Abraham, is inserted to shew the deep subjection of the ordinary Abrahamic to the Melchisedec priesthood, seeing that, notwithstanding his privilege of descent, he was subjected to his own priest, his brother, who in turn paid tithes in Abraham to Melchisedec).

6.] But (answers to "indeed," ver. 5) he whose pedigree is never (see below) reckoned from them (the sons of Levi, not, from the sons of Israel, nor, from Levi and Abraham: and it means "from them," i. e. their line of descent) hath taken tithes of Abraham (not, received, as A. V. The sentence is cast into this form, because of the enduring nature of the office and priesthood of Melchisedec, which is given by the perfect tense), and hath blessed the possessor of the promises (some would urge the present sense,—"him who now possesses the promises;" but there seems to be no necessity for this. I should rather take the words for a quasi-official designation of Abraham [see on ch. vi. 12], as the possessor of the promises). And without all controversy the less is blessed by the better (it is obvious that the axiom here laid down only holds good where the blessing is a solemn and official one, as of a father, or a priest: as was the case here. In such cases the blesser stands in the place of God, and as so standing is of superior dignity). 8.] Second item of superiority, in that Melchisedec's is an enduring, the Levitical a transitory priesthood. And here indeed (the Levitical priesthood being still in existence in the Writer's time) men who die (there is a secondary emphasis on men: men, who die) receive tithes (different sorts of tenths taken of different things); but there (i. e. in this matter concerning Melchisedec) one, of whom it is testified (one, no longer "a man of whom." This is not again expressed, nor is it to be supplied. The mysterious character of Melchisedec is still before the Writer. The testimony meant is certainly that of Scripture; probably, that in Ps. cx. 4, where an eternal priesthood, and therefore duration, is predicated of Melchisedec. It cannot well be, as Calvin and others hold, the mere negative fact of his death not being recorded, which would not amount to a testimony that he lives: and it is improbable that in so express a statement as this the Writer should, as some imagine, intend to combine both the positive testimony and the inference from the omission) that he liveth (this clearly cannot be interpreted of the priesthood of Melchisedec enduring: for what is here said is eminently personal, and that Melchisedec himself is meant, is shewn by the historical reference to the fact of his receiving tithes of Abraham. As Bleek well remarks, if the dying applies personally to the sons of Levi, the living must also apply personally to Melchisedec). <sup>9.</sup> The Jew might reply, that it was nothing to him, if Abraham paid tithes to Melchisedec; for Abraham was no priest, and therefore paid tithes naturally to a priest: the Writer therefore proceeds to a third proof, shewing that in Abraham even Levi himself, the patriarch of the Jewish priesthood, paid tithes. And so to speak (the phrase is used when any thing is about to be said that is unexpected, or somewhat strained, not likely to be universally recognized, at least in the general way in which it is asserted. It may be here regarded as introducing and softening a strong saying), by means of Abraham Levi also, who receiveth tithes (who is the head and representative of the tithe-taking tribe. Indeed the name here is almost a collective one, the personal reference being taken up in the next clause), hath been taken tithes of (on the perfect, see above, ver. 6).

<sup>10.</sup> For he was yet in the loins of his father (i. e. his forefather, Abraham: for Isaac was not yet born, much less Jacob. On the expression, compare ver. 5), when Melchisedec met him.

<sup>11—25.</sup> Further proof of the perfection of Christ's priesthood, as compared with the Levitical: (11—14) in that He sprang from a tribe not recognized as a priestly one by the law, thus setting aside the law: (15—19) in that He was constituted priest not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life, thus impugning the former commandment as weak and unprofitable: (20—22) in that He was made with an oath, they without one: (23, 24) in that they by reason of their transitoriness were many, whereas He was one and unchangeable.

On the various meanings assigned, see the note in my Greek Test. If we consider the priesthood as the basis on which the law was constructed, so that not the priests only, but the people also [compare the same, in ch. ix. 19] were involved in the question of the dignity and finality of the priesthood, then a sufficient reason seems to be gained for inserting this parenthesis: as if it were said, not only they, but the whole system of which the priesthood was the basis and centre) the people (emphatic) hath received the law (the perfect is used, as indicating the fact that the people was still remaining, and observing the law),—what further need (was there) (what need after that,—any longer, that being so) that a different priest (more than “another”—not only another, but of a different kind) should arise after the order of Melchisedec, and that he (the priest that should arise) is said to be not after the order of Aaron (on the construction, see my Greek Test.)?

12.] For if the priesthood is changed (better thus than A. V., "the priesthood being changed"), there takes place of necessity a change of the law also (viz. of that law, which as above, is legislated upon the ground of that priesthood: not of the law of the priesthood only, nor of the ceremonial law only. The connexion is with the parenthesis in ver. 11, which was inserted to prepare the way for our verse. The Writer as yet expresses himself mildly and cautiously: the change here in fact amounts to the disannulling in ver. 18, but is not yet so expressed).

13.] Confirmation of the position that a change is made in the law, by another fact indicative of a change in the priesthood. For he with reference to whom these things (viz. the promise in Ps. cx.: not, these which I am now saying) are said is member of (pertaineth to, literally, hath taken part in: the perfect implying the taking of his humanity) a different tribe (from that of Levi, which has been already sufficiently indicated in the preceding context), of which (sprung from which, coming from which) no one hath (ever, to this day) given attention (applied himself, see ch. ii. 1, note) to the altar (i. e. as a general and normal practice, hath had any thing to do with the service of the priesthood).

14.] Proof of ver. 13. For it is plain to all (the word is used of that which lies before men's eyes, plain and undoubted) that our Lord (this is the only place in Scripture where Christ is called by this appellation, now so familiar to us, without the addition of either His personal or official name. 2 Pet. iii. 15, "the long-suffering of our Lord," is hardly an exception: see there) hath arisen (some have thought that this word, which, as an intransitive verb, is generally used of the heavenly bodies, has reference to our Lord's rising as a Sun of Righteousness: so Mal. iv. 2; Isa. lx. 1; Num. xxiv. 17, to which Theophylact thinks there is allusion here. And it is quite legitimate, and a very beautiful thought, to regard these sublime ideas as having been in the Writer's mind, while at the same time we confess, that the word is used of the springing or rising up of other things, e. g. of water: and especially of the sprouting of plants) out of Judah (this word may be the name, either of the tribe or of the patriarch. From Gen. xlix. 9, 10, it would appear to be the personal name: but preceded and followed as it is here by "a different tribe," and "of which tribe," it would rather seem to be that of the tribe); of (with reference to) which tribe Moses said nothing concerning priests (i. e. nothing to imply that any priests should be or be consecrated out of it: reserving that entirely for the tribe of Levi).

15—17.] Another proof that the law is changed (set aside): for our Lord could not be of the law (i. e., the Levitical priesthood), seeing he is an eternal Priest. And it (viz. the change of the law; the proposition of ver. 12) is yet more abundantly manifest: if (i. e. seeing that) according to the simili-

The power here spoken of does not, however, strictly correspond, in its relation to the priesthood spoken of, with "the law of a carnal commandment" above. That was the rule, by and after which the priesthood was constituted: this, the vigour inherent in the glorious priesthood of Christ,—for it is of His enduring Melchisedec-priesthood in glory that this is spoken—to endure for ever. Some have thought the power to be, Christ's power to confer life on others: others the enduring nature of the divine decree which constituted this priesthood: but both are shewn to be wrong by the next verse, in which the enduringness of the priesthood is the point brought out).

opened to us by the shedding of Christ's blood once for all, so that we being justified by faith can approach the very throne of God. The verb here used is the technical term in the Septuagint for the drawing near of the priests in their sacrificial ministrations. It remains to treat of the connexion of the above sentence, vv. 18, 19, which has been entirely mistaken by many, and among them by the A. V. The ending clause, "but the bringing in of a better hope," has been wrongly joined with "for the law made nothing perfect:" and that, either 1) as A. V., "but the bringing in of a better hope did." Beza appears here, as in so many other cases, to have led our translators into error; or 2) "For the law perfected nothing, but was the introduction," &c. This latter is successfully impugned by Beza, on the ground that the law was not an introduction at all, from the very meaning [see above] of that word. See the rest of the matter argued in my Greek Test.).

20—22.] See summary at ver. 11. Further proof of the superiority of the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ—in that he was constituted in it by an oath, thus giving it a solemnity and weight which that other priesthood had not.

And inasmuch as [it was] not without an oath (the ellipsis here is variously supplied. Some fill it up out of what follows, "that He became surety." And this seems on the whole more natural, and more agreeable to the style of our Epistle, than to put in, as A. V., "he was made priest," or as Bleek, and others, "this [the bringing in of a better hope] took place": for they [as we know] without swearing of an oath are made priests (are made, as strongly marking the existence of these priests at the time of writing); but He with swearing of an oath by Him who saith (i. e., certainly not the Psalmist, who cannot be said to have spoken this unto Him, unless indeed we take "unto" in the mere secondary sense of "with reference to." In the following citation it is the words of address only to which this refers: the former part is the mere introduction to them. Not seeing this has led to the above mistake. It was God who addressed Him, God who made Him priest, God who sware unto Him) to Him, The Lord (Jehovah) sware and will not repent (i. e. the decree stands fast, and shall undergo no change), Thou art a priest for ever:—of so much (in that same proportion, viz. as the difference between the oath and no oath indicates) better a testament (the meanings of the word thus rendered [diatheke], 1) an appointment, without concurrence of a second party, of somewhat concerning that second party,—of which nature is a last will and testament, 2) a mutual agreement in which all parties concerned consent,—a covenant, in the proper sense,—being confessed, our business here is, not to enquire what is the fixed theological acceptance of the word, and so to render it here, irrespective of any subsequent usage by our Writer himself; but to enquire 1) how he uses it in this Epistle, 2) whether he is likely to have used it in more than one sense:—and to render accordingly. Now it cannot well be doubted, that in ch. ix. 16, 17, he does use it in the sense of "testament." And just as little can it be questioned, that he is speaking there of the same thing as here; that the "new testament" there answers to the better testament here, this first mention of it being in fact preparatory to that fuller treatment. I therefore keep here to the A. V.) also hath Jesus become surety ("Jesus is become the surety of the better covenant, i. e. in His person security and certainty is given to men, that a better covenant is made and sanctioned by God.

For Christ, the Son of God, became man, to publish this covenant on earth,—has sealed it with His sufferings and death, and by His resurrection from the dead was declared with power to be sent by God as the Founder of such a Covenant.” Lünemann. This seems better, considering the context, in which our hope mainly, and not at present Christ’s satisfaction, is in question, than to bring in, as some do, that satisfaction, or to regard His suretyship as meaning His mediatorship [see ch. viii. 6, where He is described as mediator of a better testament or covenant] seen from both sides—that He is God’s surety for man and man’s surety for God).

23—25.] Further proof still of the superiority of Christ’s priesthood, in that the Levitical priests were continually removed by death: Christ is undying and abiding. This point was slightly touched before in ver. 8, and again in ver. 16 f.: in the first place it was to shew the abiding nature of the superiority of the priesthood—its endurance in Melchisedec, and in Christ, Melchisedec’s antitype, as contrasted with dying men who here receive tithes. In the second, it was to bring out the difference between the ordinances which constituted the two priesthoods: the one the law of a carnal commandment, the other, the power of an endless life. Here, the personal contrast is dwelt on: the many, which change: the ONE, who abides.

23.] And they indeed (i. e. the Levitical priests) are appointed priests in numbers (the chief emphasis is on this latter point, as contrasted with unchangeable below), on account of their being by death hindered from continuing (in life? or, in their priesthood? The latter is taken by many, and is the more probable. The context clearly here treats of abiding in the priesthood: besides which, it would be somewhat tautological to say that they were hindered by death from continuing in life): but He, on account of his remaining for ever (here again our former argument conversely applies, and obliges us to understand this remaining of endurance now in life, not in priesthood. It would be tautology to say, as some explain it, “because He remains a priest for ever, He has an unchangeable priesthood:” besides that thus the members of the parallelism would not correspond. They, on account of their deaths, are subject to continual renewal: He, because he lives for ever, has his priesthood unchangeable. See John viii. 35; xii. 34; xxi. 22 f.: 1 Cor. xv. 6: Phil. i. 25), hath his priesthood unchangeable.

25.] Whence (since he ever liveth) also (as a natural consequence, something else, flowing from and accompanying the last: but with a slightly characteristic force: a new and higher thing follows) He is able to save (in its usual solemn New Test. sense, to rescue from sin and condemnation) to the uttermost (some take this of time: “He is ever able to save,” or “He is able to save for ever.” But this is not the usage of the word. Bleek has shewn by very many instances, that completeness, not duration, is its idea) those that approach (see above, ver. 19) through Him (i. e. by faith in Him. The contrast is to those, whose approach to God was through the Levitical priesthood) to God, ever living as He does (this clause in fact is explanatory of the “wherefore,” giving the reason which is wrapped up in that conjunction) to intercede for them (this intercession implies the whole mediatorial work, which the exalted Saviour performs for his own with his heavenly Father, either by reference to his past death of blood by which He has bought

26.] For such (i. e. such as is above described: retrospective, not prospective, as some have taken it. Then the following adjectives serve as appositional predicates, carrying forward the word such, and enlarging on the attributes of our High Priest, which were already slightly touched ch. iv. 14, 15) an High Priest was for us (emphasis on us) becoming also ("nay, not only for all the above-mentioned reasons, but even for this"),—holy (the word here thus rendered is not the ordinary one, "hagios," but "hosios," that used in Ps. xvi. 10, and cited in Acts ii. 27, as the especial title of the incarnate Son of God, perfect in piety and reverent holiness towards his heavenly Father), harmless (simple and free from vice or evil suspicion), undefiled (not only from legal, but from moral pollution, in deed, word, and thought), separated from sinners (from the whole race and category of sinners. This lets us into the true meaning, which is, not that Christ, ever and throughout, was free from sin, however true that may be, but [see next clause] that in his service as our High Priest, He, as the Levitical high priests in their service [Levit. xxi. 10 ff.], is void of all contact and commerce with sinners, removed far away in his glorified state and body, into God's holy place. This expression exactly answers to that in ch. ix. 28, where it is said that he shall come a second time without, apart from, sin: see there), and made (advanced to be) higher than the heavens; who hath not necessity (the present tense shews, that the Writer is not setting forth the ideal of a high priest, but speaking of the actual existing attributes of our great High Priest, as He is) day by day (the allusion is to the daily offerings of the priests, Ex. xxix. 38-42; Num. xxviii. 3-8, which are spoken of as offered by the high priests, though they took part in them only on festival days, because the high priests in fact lead and represent the whole priesthood), as the high priests, to offer sacrifices first for his own sins, then for those of the people (so Philo, speaking also of the daily sacrifices. Still it must be confessed that the application of such an idea to them has no authority in the law: and it would seem probable, as Bleek suggests, that the ceremonies of the great day of atonement were throughout before the mind of the Writer, as the chief and archetypal features of the High Priest's work, but repeated in some sort in the daily sacrifices. The most probable solution of the difficulty however is that proposed by Hofmann and approved by Delitzsch: that "day by day," from its situation, belongs not to the high priests, but only to Christ: "who has not need day by day, as the high priests had year by year," &c.): for this he did (what? of necessity, by the shewing of ver. 26 and of ch. iv. 15, the offering for the sins of the people only. To include in this the whole, "first for his own, then for those of the people," would be either to contradict these testimonies of the Writer himself, or to give some second and unnatural sense to sins, as the Socinian interpreters do, who regard it as importing only weaknesses when applied to Christ. Besides, as Delitzsch well observes, the idea of "offering himself for his own sins" would be against all sacrificial analogy, according to which the sinless is an offering for the sinful) once for all, when He offered (see above) Himself (this is the first place in the Epistle where mention is made of Christ's having offered Himself. Henceforward it becomes more and more familiar to the reader: "once struck, the note sounds on ever louder and louder," Delitzsch).

28.] Final bringing out of the contrast between the Aaronic priests and Christ. For (gives the reason for the difference in the last verse) the law makes men (emphatic, opposed to the Son below) high priests, who have infirmity (compare ch. v. 2, of the human high priest, and see below. The expression here involves, from the context, liability to sin, and subjection to, removal by, death. Christ had not the first, and therefore need not offer for his own sin: he was freed from the second, and therefore need not repeat His sacrifice); but the word (utterance; or, purport) of the oath which was after the law (these words, "the oath which was after the law," belong together, which ought to be marked in the A. V. by the omission of the comma after "oath.") This oath is recorded in David, i.e. subsequently to the giving of the law, and therefore as antiquating it and setting it aside. The argument is similar to that in Gal. iii. 17), (makes) the Son, made perfect (in this participle, as Delitzsch remarks, lies enwrapped the whole process of the Son's assumption of human infirmity, and being exalted through it: for this being made perfect was through sufferings, ch. ii. 10, v. 9. Those priests, by their infirmity, were removed away in death, and replaced by others: He, by that infirmity, which He took on Him, went out through death into glory eternal, and an unrenovable priesthood) for evermore (these words belong simply and entirely to the participle,

"made perfect." The A. V. has obliterated both sense, and analogy with ch. ii. 10 and v. 9, by rendering this participle, 'consecrated').

CHAP. VIII. 1—13.] Not only is Christ personally, as a High Priest, above the sons of Aaron, but the service and ordinances of the covenant to which His High Priesthood belongs are better than those of that to which they belong.

"who sat down," &c.), who sat down ("in ch. i. 3, the sitting at the right hand of God was mentioned as a pre-eminence of the Son above the angels, who stand as ministering spirits before the presence of God: here, where the same is said of Christ as High Priest, Delitzsch and others rightly remark that there is again a pre-eminence over the Jewish high priests: for these, even when they entered the holiest place, did not sit down by the throne of God, but only stood before it for a moment: compare ch. x. 11, 12." true (archetypal, only true, as so often in St. John, and in one passage of St. Luke, xvi. 11) tabernacle, which the Lord (here evidently the Father: see note on ch. xii. 14) pitched, not [any] man (it is an important question, symbolically considered, whether any and what distinction is intended by the Writer, between the holy place and the tabernacle. Delitzsch has gone into it at length, and Hofmann has treated of it in two places. Both are agreed that the holy place betokens the immediate immaterial presence of God, the veritable Holy of Holies, beyond, and approached through, the heavens, ch. iv. 11. But as regards the tabernacle they differ. Hofmann maintains it to be the glorified body of Christ, and argues that it alone will satisfy such expressions as that in ch. ix. 11, "not of this creation:" in order to satisfying which, this tabernacle must belong to the new creation, the regeneration, which commences with the glorification of Christ. This glorified body of His is the new and abiding temple of God, in which He dwells and meets with us who are united to and have put on that glorified body, our house, eternal in the heavens: for so Hofmann interprets 2 Cor. v. 1 ff. On the other hand, Delitzsch controverts this view, as inconsistent with the symbolism in ch. ix. 11, 12, where Christ, "through the greater and more perfect tabernacle . . . entered into the holy place," taking this connexion of the words: and also with our ver. 5, where the Mosaic tabernacle is set forth as the representation and shadow of the heavenly. Accordingly, he believes the tabernacle here to be the heavenly Jerusalem, the worship-place of blessed spirits [Ps. xxix. 9] and of those men who have been rapt in vision thither [Isa. vi.],—the "temple of the tabernacle of witness," of Rev. xv. 5,—the place where God's visible presence [in contradistinction to His personal and invisible presence in the holy places] is manifested to his creatures angelic and human. In weighing these two opinions, I own they seem to me to run into one, and of that one by far the larger component is on Hofmann's side.

For what is the Heavenly Jerusalem? What but the aggregate, in their persons and their glorious abiding-place, of the triumphant saints and servants of God? And what is this aggregate, but the mystical body of which Christ is the Head and they are the members, in its fulfilment and perfection? That glorified body of His, in which they are accepted before God, and in which as a heavenly temple they serve God, and God dwells, He has passed through, not by passing out of it, but by finally establishing it as an accomplished thing in God's sight, and in and as proceeding forth from it carrying on his intercession and ministration in the true tabernacle, in the holy place itself. See more on this subject, ch. ix. 11: and the views of Bleek, Tholuck, &c.: also a sermon of Schleiermacher's on the text, vol. ii. of his Predigten, p. 504).

3—6.] This heavenly office and work our High Priest must have, if He be veritably a High Priest. 3.] For every high priest is appointed to offer gifts and sacrifices (see the very similar passage, ch. v. 1, and note there): whence it is necessary that this (High Priest) also have somewhat which He may offer (there is here considerable difficulty. For the Writer is evidently, from what follows, laying the stress on the heavenly "ministry" of Christ: and this "something to offer" applies therefore to His work, not on earth, but in heaven. If so, how comes it to be said that He has somewhat to offer in heaven, seeing that His offering, of Himself, was made once for all, in contradistinction to those of the Levitical priests which were being constantly offered? See especially ch. x. 11, 12, which, on this view, brings the Writer here into direct contradiction to himself. In order to avoid this, Lünemann and Hofmann attempt to make the "something to offer" retrospective: "it is necessary for Him to have [there, in heaven] somewhat [viz. His body] which he may have offered." But surely this is a view which cannot be admitted. The straightforward construction of our sentence makes it necessary that the words should refer to an act done in the state pointed out, however the nature of that act may be, in each case of its being done, such as to be accomplished at the moment, and not enduring onwards: which latter would certainly involve the contradiction above spoken of. Thus regarded then, what is it which our High Priest in heaven has to offer? In ch. v. 7, He is described as having offered prayers and supplications in the days of His flesh: and it might be thought that His interceding for us, ch. vii. 25, might be here meant, the offering being those intercessions. But this would hardly satisfactorily give the force of the words somewhat, which, as Delitzsch remarks, is too concrete for such an interpretation. It must be something with which and by virtue of which, and as offering and applying which, our High Priest enters and ministers in the Holy of Holies above. Now if we look to the analogy of ch. ix. 7, 12, we see (1) that the high priest entered the holy place “not without blood, which he offers for himself, and for the ignorances of the people,”—(2) that Christ is entered into the holy places of heaven, not with the blood of goats and bulls, but by His own blood: see also ib. ver. 25. This BLOOD of the one offering, Christ is represented as bearing into the Holy Place, and its application is set ever forth to us as a continuing and constantly repeated one. Thus this blood of sprinkling is regarded as being in heaven, ch. xii. 24: as being sprinkled on the believer as the end of his election, 1 Pet. i. 2: as cleansing us from all sin, 1 John i. 7: as that wherein the saints wash their robes and make them white, Rev. vii. 14. Still, as Delitzsch also remarks, this is not the place to enlarge on this matter, seeing that it is merely incidentally introduced here, the present object being to shew that it is in heaven, and not on earth, that our High Priest ministers).

4.] Yea, if (the connexion is

But on earth this could not be: yea, &c.”) He were on earth, He would not even be a Priest (observe the emphasis: which is not, as Bleek, He would not even be a priest, much less a High Priest, but the stress is on the verb be, and it is taken as a matter agreed that the High Priest belonged to the genus priest: “He would not even belong to the category of priests.” In the background lies, “and if not so, certainly could not be a High Priest:” but it is not brought forward, nor does it belong to the argument), since there are (‘there are already:’ not, “were,” as is shewn by the present tense below. Faber Stapulensis interprets it, "that what was shewn to Moses in the mount was not the truth itself, but only an adumbration and idea of it." And so Schlichting, concluding, "so that the ancient tabernacle was only an example of an example, and a shadow of a shadow." This view is strongly controverted by Delitzsch, who takes the pattern to be the veritable heavenly things themselves, not seen however by Moses directly and naturally, which would be impossible, but made visible to him in a vision. I do not see that there is much to choose between the two views. If the latter be taken, then surely the vision thus vouchsafed to Moses was itself only an intermediate representation, and so this view comes much to the same as the other.

6.] But now (the logical, not the temporal now, as in ch. ix. 26; xi. 16, and frequently in St. Paul, meaning, "as the fact really is") He hath obtained a more excellent ministry (than that of any earthly priests), in proportion as He is also (also, introducing a special reference to an already acknowledged fact, as in ch. vi. 7, where see note) mediator (the meaning of the word is, one who becomes a goer between two persons, assuring to each the consent of the other to some point agreed on in common. The genitive after mediator may either be of the persons between whom, as in 1 Tim. ii.

Theodoret says, "For the old covenant had joined to it material promises, a hand flowing with milk and honey, and abundance of children, and the like: but the new has eternal life, and the kingdom of heaven." But as Bleek objects, it would be very improbable that the Writer should intend to refer the promises, on which the old covenant was based, to mere earthly blessings, in the face of such a designation of the hope of Abraham and the patriarchs, as we find in ch. xi. 10—19).

"After the sack of Jerusalem, Jeremiah with the other captives was brought in chains to Rama, where Nebuzaradan had his head-quarters. There took place, at God's special command, his prophecies of the future entire restoration of Israel, of another David, of Rachel's weeping over her children at Rama, and their future return, of the new covenant resting on absolute and veritable forgiveness of sins which Jehovah would make with his people, these prophecies forming the third part of the third trilogy of the three great trilogies into which the prophecies of Jeremiah may be divided: ch. xxi.—xxv., the book against the shepherds of the people: ch. xxvi.—xxix., the book of Jeremiah's conflict against the false prophets: ch. xxx., xxxi., the book of restoration," Delitzsch. "The question which has before now been abundantly handled, whether the saying refers to the return of the exiles, or to the covenant of which Christ is the mediator, or to the future general conversion of the Jews, or whether some things in it to one of these, some to another, or whether the whole in its lower literal sense to the return of the exiles and in its higher spiritual sense to Christ and His kingdom, must be answered by the considerations before adduced on ch. i. 5. It belongs throughout to the cycle of Messianic prophecies, and is one of the most beautiful and sublime of them; and its true fulfilment can only be sought in the covenant brought in by the Saviour, and in the salvation through Him imparted to mankind, and ever more and more unfolded and completed. This is the case, however this salvation, in the perception and declaration of the prophet, is bound up with the restoration of the ancient covenant people and their reunion in the land of their home." On the fact of their not continuing in God's covenant, Delitzsch gives a striking quotation from Schelling,—"The Law appears to be the mere ideal of a religious constitution, as it has never existed in fact: in practice, the Jews were almost throughout polytheists. The substance of their national feeling was formed by heathendom; the accidents only, by revelation. From the queen of heaven down to the abominations of the Phœnicians, and even to Cybele, the Jews passed through every grade of paganism." "In fact," adds Delitzsch, "there is no period of the history of Israel before the captivity, in which more or less idolatry was not united with the worship of Jehovah, except the time of David and the first years of Solomon, during which the influence of Sammel still continued to be felt. And when by the captivity Idol-worship was completely eradicated from the people, as far at least as regards that part of it which returned, it is well known that a hypocritical letter-worship got the mastery over them, which was morally very little better." See note on Matt. xii. 43.

<sup>10.]</sup> For (the reason rendered is for the expression "new," above: "new, I say: for . . .") this (predicate, explained in what follows) is the covenant which I will establish to the house of Israel (Israel here in its wider sense, comprehending both Israel proper and Judah: because then all Israel shall be again united) after those days (after the end of that dispensation, when those days of disregard are over), saith the Lord, giving (or, putting). This is the first of the better promises on which the new covenant is established) my laws into their mind (their inward parts, their spiritual man, as distinguished from the mere sensorium which receives impressions from without); and on their heart will I inscribe them (contrast to the inscription of the old law, which was on tables of stone: see 2 Cor. iii. 3), and I will be to them for (as ch. i. 5, which see) a God, and they shall be to me for a people.

<sup>11.]</sup> Second of the better promises—universal spread of the knowledge of God: following on the other, that God would put His laws in their minds and write them in their hearts. And they shall not have to teach every man his [fellow]-citizen, and every man his brother, saying, Know (plural: "Know ye") the Lord: because all shall know me, from the small [one] even to the great [one] of them (that is, "they shall be all taught of God," as cited by our Lord in John vi. 45, from Isa. liv. 13, as written in the prophets, alluding to such passages as this, and Joel ii. 28, 29. See also 1 John ii. 20, 27, and notes there. Under the old covenant, the priests' lips were to keep knowledge, and they were to teach the people God's ways: under the new, there is no more need for the believer to have recourse to man for teaching in the knowledge of God, for the Holy Spirit, which is given to all that ask, reveals the things of Christ to each, according to the measure of his spiritual attainment and strength of faith. And the inner reason of this now follows, making, formally, the third of these better promises, but in fact bound up with, and the condition of, the last mentioned). Because ("by God passing

13.] Transition to the antithetical parallel which he is about to draw between the former, earthly and ceremonial, and the latter, heavenly and actual tabernacle: see summary at ch. ix. 1. In saying (here, as in each of those, the subject is God, belonging here to the following verb: "when God saith"), A new [covenant], he hath made old (made old, viz. by speaking of,—and where God is the speaker, actually in decree establishing, seeing that all God's sayings are realities,—a new one) the first [covenant]. But (transition from a particular assertion, to an axiomatic general truth: as in Rom. xiv. 23) that which is being made old (the saying of God hath made old that first covenant: the state of antiquation thereby induced, continues, as the perfect tense shews,—and hence the covenant is continually being made old) and getting into old age is nigh unto vanishing away (the writer uses the expression of the whole time subsequent to the utterance of the prophecy. At that time the being made old began, by the mention of a new covenant: and from that time the first covenant might be regarded as ever dwindling away, so to speak, and near its end, which God might bring on at any time. It is far better to regard the being ready to vanish away thus, than, with some, to place it at the time of the Writer, when in fact it had already taken place).

CHAP. IX. 1.] The chief train of thought and argument, although in the main forwarded, has been for the present somewhat broken, by the long citation in the last chapter. It is now resumed. Christ is the High Priest of a heavenly tabernacle, the Mediator of a covenant established upon better promises. This latter has been shewn out of Scripture: and it has been proved that the old covenant was by that Scripture pronounced to be transitory and near its end. As such, it is now compared in detail with this second and better one, as to its liturgical apparatus and proffered means of access to God. These are detailed somewhat minutely, mention being even made of some which are not insisted on, nor their symbolism explained: and the main point of comparison, the access into the holiest place, is hastened on. In this particular especially the infinite superiority of the new covenant is insisted on: and the whole access of Christ into God's presence for us is elaborately contrasted with the former insufficient ceremonial access by means of animal sacrifices. In one point, above all, is this contrast brought out: the supreme efficacy of the blood of Christ, as set against the nullity of the blood of bulls and of goats to purge away sin. Then the subject of the heavenly tabernacle and holy place is recurring to, and the future prospect of Christ's re-appearing from thence opened.

1.] Now accordingly (this takes up the thought of ch. viii. 5, where the command is recited directing Moses to make the tabernacle after the pattern shewn him in the mount. In pursuance of that command it was that the first covenant had, &c.) the first [covenant] (not, the first tabernacle, as the received text in the Greek wrongly and clumsily glosses. There is no question between a first and second tabernacle: the greater and more perfect tabernacle is a prototype, not an afterthought. The gloss has probably arisen from a blunder in interpreting "the first tabernacle" in ver. 8: see there) had (it was no longer subsisting in the Writer's time as a covenant, however its observances might be still surviving. Or perhaps the word had may refer back to the time indicated in ch. viii. 5, when Moses made the tabernacle: had, when its liturgical appliances were first provided. But I prefer the other view) also (as well as this second and more perfect covenant: not that this has all the things below mentioned, but that it too possesses its corresponding liturgical appliances, though of a higher kind) ordinances ("the old covenant also had liturgical ordinances, which were of divine right, ordinances which rested their obligatory right upon revelation from God and declaration of His will," Delitzsch) of service (worship: see ch. viii. 5 and note), and its (or, the: see below) worldly sanctuary (as the whole passage treats of the distinction between the two sanctuaries, one into which the Levitical priests entered, and the other into which Christ is entered, it is certain that the signification must be local only. worldly, i. e. 'mundane,' belonging to this world. It stands opposed to heavenly, and is an epithet distinguishing the sanctuary of the first covenant from that of the second, not one common to the two. This is also shewn by the article the. The first covenant had not merely a worldly sanctuary, but the only sanctuary which was upon earth: that one which was constructed after the pattern of things in the heavens).

2—5.] Explanatory of the worldly sanctuary by a particular detail. For the tabernacle was established (set up as a tent), the first one (in situation to those entering: see Acts xvi. 12 note), in which were the candlestick (with seven lights: of gold, carved with almond flowers, pomegranates, and lilies: see Exod. xxv. 31—39, xxxvii. 17—24. There were ten of these in the Temple of Solomon, see 1 Kings vii. 49; 2 Chron. iv. 7: but in the second Temple, the Mosaic regulation was returned to, and only one placed in the tabernacle: see 1 Macc. i. 21, iv. 49. Josephus describes Vespasian's triumph, and the candlestick as borne in it, which is now to be seen in relief on the arch of Titus at Rome), and the table (for the shewbread: of shittim [acacia?] wood, overlaid with gold, Exod. xxv. 23—30, xxxvii. 10—16, of which there was one only in the Mosaic tabernacle, and in the second temple [1 Macc. as above], but ten in Solomon's temple, see 2 Chron. iv. 8; also ib. ver. 19; 1 Chron. xxviii. 16; 1 Kings vii. 48), and the shew of the bread (so literally. There can be little doubt that Tholuck and Delitzsch are right, who understand this not of the custom of exhibiting the bread, but, seeing that the Writer is speaking of concrete objects, as the heap of bread itself thus exhibited); which tabernacle ("that tabernacle namely, which") is called the holy place (literally, places or parts: there is no substantive expressed).

3.] But (as bringing out by anticipation the same contrast which we have in vv. 6, 7) after (i. e. in entering: "behind," as we should say, if regarding it 'in situ') the second veil (or curtain hanging before the sanctuary. There were in reality two of these, as described in Exod. xxvi. 31—37: one before the holy of holies itself [vv. 31—35], the other before the tabernacle door [vv. 36, 37]) the (not "a," see above) tabernacle which is called holy of holies (literally holies); having (see below) a golden censer [or, altar of incense] (there is considerable difficulty here. The word used may mean either an altar upon which, or a censer in which, incense was burnt. On the side of the latter meaning it is remarkable, that much stress is laid by the Mishna upon the censer to be used on the day of expiation, as distinguished from that used on any other day: on the fact of its being of gold, and of a particular and precious kind of gold. But if this latter interpretation be adopted, we are involved in the following difficulty. This golden censer is nowhere named in the law: the word rendered "censer" by A. V. in Levit. xvi. 12, is a shallow basin, in which the high priest on the day of atonement was to take incense from the incense-altar into the holy place. Besides which, it is not specified as golden; nor was it kept in the Holy of holies. Indeed it could not have been, or the high priest would have been obliged to fetch it from thence before burning incense in it, which is most improbable. Of these, the first-mentioned objection is not decisive; for our Writer is speaking, not of Mosiac usage only, but of several things outside the provisions of the law itself; and thus our explanation of any difficulty need not be sought in the provisions of the law only, but also in subsequent Jewish usage. If now, influenced by the above difficulties, we adopt the interpretation "altar of incense," a difficulty arises, certainly not less than any of those adduced above. On the one hand the word having at first sight seems to admit of no other meaning than a local one, "containing." The parallelism with wherein was above appears to demand this, and the fact that the other things mentioned are beyond question intended to be in, not merely belonging to, the Holy of holies. On this, see more below. Taking it as our first impression, we are startled by the fact, that the altar of incense was not in the Holy of holies, but outside it. Hence Bleek, De Wette, and Lünemann, suppose that the Writer has fallen into a mistake, and Bleek infers from this that he was not an inhabitant of Palestine, but an Alexandrine. But as Delitzsch observes, whichever he were, he must have been a perfect monster of ignorance, to have fallen into any such error. "Then," continues Delitzsch, "since we cannot submit him to such an imputation, is there any intent which our Writer may have had, inducing him to ascribe the altar of incense to the Holy of holies, notwithstanding that he knew its local situation to be in the Holy place?" There is such an intent, recognized even by Bleek himself. "The Author," says Bleek, and after him Tholuck, "treats the Holy of holies, irrespective of the veil, as symbolical of the heavenly sanctuary, and had also a motive to include in it the altar of incense, whose offerings of incense are the symbol of the prayers of the saints, Rev. viii. 3 ff." And even so it is. Not only the New Test. writings, but the Old Test. also, Isa. vi. 6, speak of a heavenly altar, which is the antitype there of the earthly. Considering the fact that this antitypical altar belonged to the Holy of holies, into which Christ entered through the torn veil, it was obvious for our Writer to reckon the typical altar also among the things belonging to the Holy of holies. Our second question then is, whether our Writer is justified, having this motive, in reckoning the altar of incense among the furniture of the Holy of holies. And our answer is, Entirely so: the following considerations have weight: a) that the altar of incense, by Exod. xxx. 6, xl. 5, is to be placed before the ark of the covenant, or before the Capporeth [mercy-seat], i.e. in the middle between the candlestick on the right and the table of shewbread on the left, so that its place is subordinate to the ark of the covenant: b) that on the day of atonement, it, as well as the mercy-seat, was sprinkled with the blood of the sin-offering: c) that in 1 Kings vi. 22, as well as by our Writer, it is reckoned to the Holy of holies, being there called the altar belonging to the sanctuary [A. V. "the altar that was by the oracle"]. The solution to be gathered from this would be, that the altar of incense, being appointed by the Mosiac ordinance to stand in immediate contiguity to the veil separating the Holy of holies, and being destined in its use especially for the service of the Holy of holies [for this, notwithstanding the objection brought by Delitzsch, might have weight; the exterior altar of burnt-offering did not belong in any such strict sense to the sanctuary and mercy-seat], and being described in more than one place of Scripture [e. g. Exod. xxx. 6; 1 Kings vi. 22] as connected with the sanctuary, is taken by the Writer as appertaining to the Holy of holies: he choosing, thus to describe it, the somewhat ambiguous word having, and not "wherein was," as before. I have thus given both views of the solution to be sought: and will now state the result. 1) On either hypothesis, having cannot be kept to its stricter meaning of containing. For neither the censer nor the incense-altar was kept in the Holy of holies. 2) The language of the Mishna concerning the golden censer is very strong, and more weight still is given to it when we reflect that it is especially of the day of expiation that our Writer is preparing to speak. 3) The word golden should not be overlooked in the consideration. When the ark of the covenant by and by is spoken of, which like the altar of incense was overlaid with gold, it is not said to be golden, but only "overlaid all round with gold." And this predicate being thus emphatically thrown forward, it is hardly possible to help feeling that a stress is laid on it, and it is not used without design. And if we enquire what this design is, we can hardly find fault with the reply which says that it is to distinguish a golden censer from some other kinds of censers. 4) On the whole then I should say that the balance inclines towards the "censer" interpretation, though I do not feel by any means that the difficulty is removed, and should hail any new solution which might clear it still further, and the ark of the covenant (see Exod. xxv. 10 ff., xxvii. 1 ff.: called by this name, Josh. iii. 6 and in other places) covered round on all sides ("within and without," Exod. xxv. 11) with gold (the ark, a chest, was of shittim [acacia] wood, overlaid with plates of fine gold, Exod. as above. The ark of the covenant was in the Holy of holies in the Mosaic tabernacle, and in the temple of Solomon, 1 Kings viii. 4, 6. In the sack by the Chaldeans, it disappeared. See a legend respecting its fate in 2 Macc. ii. 1—8, where curiously enough "the tabernacle, and the ark, and the altar of incense," are classed together. The second temple did not contain it, but it was represented by a stone basement three fingers high, called "the stone of foundation"), in which [was] a golden pot (Ex. xvi. 32—34. The word "golden" is added by the Septuagint: so also Philo: the Hebrew has merely "a pot," as A. V.) containing the manna (viz. an omer, each man's daily share laid up for a memorial, see Exod. xvi. 32 with ib. 16. That this pot was to be placed in the ark, is not said there, but it was gathered probably from the words "before the Lord." In 1 Kings viii. 9; 2 Chron. v. 10, it is stated that there was nothing in the ark in

Solomon's temple, except the two tables which Moses put therein at Horeb. But this, as Delitzsch observes, will not prove any thing against the pot of manna and the rod having once been there; nay rather, from the express declaration that there was then nothing but the tables of stone, it would seem that formerly there had been other things there. The Rabbis certainly treat of the pot of manna, as of the rod, as being in the ark), and the rod of Aaron which budded (see Numb. xvii. 1—11. It was to be laid up "before the testimony," in which Ben Gershom sees a proof that it was in the ark. The Gemara mentions a tradition that with the ark disappeared the pot of manna, and the cruse of anointing oil, and the rod of Aaron with its almonds and blossoms, and the chest which the Philistines sent for a trespass-offering, 1 Sam. vi. 4, 8), and the tables of the covenant (viz. the tables of stone on which the ten commandments were written by the finger of God, Exod. xxv. 16, xxxi. 18; Dent. x. 1—5; 1 Kings viii. 9; 2 Chron. v. 10, as above. It will be seen from these references, that these tables were ordered to be put in the ark); 5.] and over above it (the ark of the covenant) [the] cherubim (the well-known fourfold animal forms, fencing from human approach, and at the same time bearing up and supporting the glory of God: symbolizing, as I believe and have elsewhere maintained [Hulsean Lectures for 1841. Lect. i. See also note on Rev. iv. 6—8], the creation of God. See more below) of glory (the glory, is the Shechinah, or bright cloud of glory, in which Jehovah appeared between the cherubim forms, and to which, as attendants and watchers, and upholders, they belonged) overshadowing (casting shadow down upon, causing to be shadowed) the mercy-seat (the mercy-seat of Exod. xxv. 17: the massive golden cover of the ark of the covenant, on which the glory of Jehovah appeared between the cherubim. It was that upon which especially the blood of the propitiatory sacrifice was sprinkled on the day of atonement, Levit. xvi. 15, and from this circumstance apparently, the propitiation taking place on it, it obtained its name of

The clause refers evidently not to the cherubim only, but to all the contents of the Sanctuary just mentioned).

6, 7.] We now have that whereunto the above details have been tending, viz. the use made of the Sanctuary by the High Priest on the day of atonement. But (transitional) these things being thus arranged, into the first (foremost) tabernacle [indeed] continually (i. e. day by day, at any time, without limits prescribed by the law: certainly, twice at least in every day, see Exod. xxx. 7 ff.) enter (on the present, see above. It must not be rendered by an imperfect, as A. V., 'went') the priests (the ordinary priests), accomplishing the services (the services meant are the morning and evening care of the lamps, the morning and evening offering of incense, and the weekly change of the shewbread); 7.] but into the second (innermost, the Holy of holies) once in the year (i. e. on the day of atonement, the 10th day of the 7th month; the same expression is used in refl. Exod. and Levit. The entrance took place, on that day, twice at least, from Levit. xvi. 12—16: the Mishna says, four [three?] times, Joma v. 1; vii. 4. Much trouble has been spent by antiquarians on the question: see the whole treated in Bleek, if it be thought worth while: it may suffice here to say that the Writer follows the ordinary way of speaking among the Jews and ourselves, meaning by "once," on one occasion. No one would think, if I said I was in the habit of seeing a certain person but once in every year, of asking how long I spent in his company during that day, and how often I looked upon him) the High Priest alone, not without (see ch. vii. 20) blood, which he offers (see ch. viii. 3) on behalf of himself, and the ignorances (sins of ignorance, see ch. v. 2. But the word may have a wider meaning than mere sins of ignorance) of the people (I have in my Greek Test. discussed the question whether this sentence will bear to be taken "for his own ignorances, and for those of the people:" and have found it not improbable, that this may have been intended): 8.] the Holy Spirit signifying (by the typical arrangement of the sanctuary, excluding all from it except the High Priest once a year: the reference of "signifying" is not to be referred back to the prophecy of Jeremiah above quoted. We often have the verb in this meaning of "signifying by a representation:" so in ch. xii. 27) this (which follows), that the way to the holy place (i. e. the true holy places in heaven: for it is of antitype, not of type, that the Writer is here speaking. Hence there is no danger of mistaking the holy place here for the outer tabernacle: it is as in Ezek. xli. 23; Lev. xvi. 16, 17, 20, 23, 27, the holy place, par excellence) has not yet been manifested (not, had not: the present form is maintained throughout:

see below), while the first tabernacle is as yet standing (what first tabernacle? That which was first in time, or first in order of space? Clearly the latter, which has already been used in ver. 6: no reason can be given for changing the sense to the temporal one, especially as the Writer is regarding the whole as present, and drawing no contrast as to time. In fact, if time be regarded, the heavenly, not the earthly tabernacle is the first. Still less can we understand the tabernacle in the wilderness, as distinguished from the temple: which would yield no assignable sense. Bleek supposes that the first tabernacle, thus understood, symbolizes the whole Jewish Levitical worship which took place in the first or outer tabernacle: Ebrard, that the whole, exterior and interior tabernacle, is symbolical, the exterior of relative, the interior of absolute holiness. But both of these ideas are well refuted by Delitzsch, who reminds us that the first as well as the second tabernacle was symbolical of heavenly things): the which (viz. the first or anterior tabernacle, and that especially considered as obstructing, by its yet remaining, the way into the holiest) is (not, "was," see above) a parable for (in reference to) the time (period, or season, with reference to the divine dispensations) now present (so Primasius,—"for what was then done in the temple, was a figure and similitude of that truth which is now fulfilled in the church." And thus recently, and to my mind decisively, Delitzsch. But observe, the first tabernacle was not a parable of the present time, so that the present time should be the thing represented:—but a parable,—for, reserved unto, or given in reference to, the present time,—of heavenly things, to which the access is in the present time revealed.

This application of the expression to the time now present, has not been the general view of Commentators. Chrysostom and others have interpreted it of the time then present, the time before the coming of Christ. But this meaning, "the time which was instant," would not agree with the present tense, are offered, to which consequently those interpreters are obliged to do violence. Accordingly we have modifications of this view, e.g. that of Ebrard, and others, that the time meant is the present time of offering Old Test. sacrifices, in which the readers of the Epistle were still taking a part. "The author might have called the time of the Old Test. worship 'the past time,' and he would doubtless have so called it, had he been minded to speak from his own standing-point: but with practical wisdom he here speaks from that of his readers, who yet joined in the temple worship, and for whom the period of sacrifices was not yet passed away." Ebrard:—that of Bleek, Tholuck, and Lünemann, "This first tabernacle is, or there lies in its establishment, a parabolic setting forth of the character of the present time in general, i.e. of the time of the Old Test.,—of Judaism." Bleek. And so A. V., "which was a figure for the time then present." See more below under "the time of reformation"); according to which (i.e. in accordance with which typical meaning; a specification accounting for and justifying the profitless character of the ordinances about to be spoken of) both gifts and sacrifices are offered (the present implies only the matter-of-fact endurance of the Levitical offerings, not their subsistence in the divine plan), having no power to perfect in conscience (see below) him that serveth (i.e. not the priests, but the people, who offered through them. "The offering Israelite assures,—doing, as he does, that which God's law requires,—his part, as a member, in the people of the law and of the promised salvation: he obtains also, if he does this with right feeling, operations of divine grace, which he seeks in the way prescribed: but, seeing that the Holy of holies is not yet unveiled, the offerings cannot perfect him in conscience, i.e. cannot put his moral-religious consciousness, in its inward feeling, into a state of entire and joyful looking for of salvation, so that his conscience should be an onward-waxing consciousness of perfect restoration, of entire clearing up, of total emancipation, of his relation to God." See the very parallel place, Col. ii. 16. The law prescribed much about eating: nothing about drinking, except some general rules of uncleanness, such as Lev. xi. 34,—and in peculiar cases, such as the prohibition of wine to the Nazirite, Numb. vi. 3,—and to the priests when on actual service in the tabernacle, Lev. x. 9. But subsequent circumstances and usage added other observances and precedents: as, e. g. Dan. i. 8; Hagg. ii. 13. See Matt. xxiii. 24; Rom. xiv. 21. So there is no necessity to suppose that the allusion is to the feasts after sacrifice [ch. xiii. 10], or to the passover. The divers washings may refer to all the various washings ordained by the law, Exod. xxix. 4; Lev. xi. 25, 28, 32, 40; xiv. 6—9; xv. 5 ff.; xvi. 4, 24 ff.; Numb. viii. 7; xix. 17 ff. 11, 12.] The fulfilment of these types by Christ. But (the contrast is to the ineffectiveness and the merely provisional nature of the Levitical offerings) Christ (not "Jesus" here: because the Writer will introduce with emphasis that name which carries with it the fulfilment of all type and prophecy. Nor again "the Christ," because he will not say that 'the Messiah' was come, but will use that well-known name as a personal name belonging to Him whom now all Christians know by it) having appeared (the verb here used is the usual word for appearing or coming forward as a historical person: appearing on the stage of the world. And it is of this appearance of Christ in history that the word is here used. That appearance was the point of demarcation between prophecy and fulfilment, between the old covenant and the new. So that the expression is rather to be taken of the whole accomplished course of Christ summed up in one, than either of His first incarnation upon earth, or of His full inauguration into His Melchisedec High Priesthood in heaven) as High Priest of the good things to come (i. e. in this case, the blessed promises of the Christian covenant, different, in the very nature of the case, from their "good things to come," but still, in formal expression, a term common to them and us: so that the expression, "high priest of the good things to come," might in its scantiness of sense have been used of a Jewish High Priest, just as it is in its fulness of completed sense used of Christ now. It is hardly necessary to add that I take to come as meaning not, which were future in respect of the law, but which are now future; the "incorruptible inheritance" of 1 Pet. i. 4, the "things hoped for" of our ch. xi. 1: see our Writer's usage in reft. The genitive after the word High Priest is not an attributive, but an objective one: the good things to come are the objects and ultimate regard of His High Priesthood), through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is, not of this creation (1) How are these words to be constructed? 2) to what tabernacle do they refer? 1) they belong to entered below, not to what went before. For in that case neither would be left without any preceding member of the negation to follow, or it must be considered as the sequence to "not made with hands," or to "not of this creation," either of which would be absurd. 2) the through is local: as the Jewish High Priest passed through the first tabernacle in entering into the earthly holy place, so our High Priest has passed through the greater and more perfect tabernacle to enter into the heavenly holy place. But, this settled, 2) what is this greater and more perfect tabernacle? The Fathers for the most part interpret it of Christ's body or human nature. Ebrard takes it of Christ's holy life, and "the holy place" of His exaltation; passing, in fact, from reality into symbol: others explain it of the Church on earth: others, of the whole world: Hofmann, of the glorified Body of Christ, which, and not the Body of His flesh, he maintains can alone be said to be not of this creation, and in which dwells [Col. ii. 9] all the fulness of the Godhead bodily: Bleek, De Wette, Lünemann, and Stier, of the lower region of the heavens, through which Christ passed in ascending to the throne of God. Tholuck thinks it to be merely a superadded feature, having no representation in reality, but serving only to complete the idea of a heavenly sanctuary. Delitzsch keeps to his interpretation in ch. viii. 2 [which see discussed in note there], as against Hofmann. But here, as there, I believe that his and Hofmann's views run up into one; though perhaps here the weight is on his side, as it was there on Hofmann's. The tabernacle here, as in ch. viii. 2, is the heavens [see ch. iv. 11] through which Christ passed not only locally, but conditionally, being the abode of blessed spirits and just men made perfect: corresponding to His mystical Body [see on ch. viii. 2: and below, on the other epithets of this tabernacle], and the holy place is the heaven itself [ver. 21], the especial abode of the invisible and unapproachable God. As regards the epithets of this tabernacle, first it is distinguished by the article the, "that tabernacle of which we know." Then it is called greater, in contrast with the small extent and import of that other, and more perfect, in contrast with its ineffectiveness and its exclusion from the divine presence: perhaps also with its merely symbolical, and its transitory nature. "The indeterminate not made with hands, a word of St. Luke in similar connexion, Acts vii. 48; xvii. 24, is explained by the Writer himself by not of this creation, and serves as an apposition to the preceding. That tabernacle is not built by hands of men, but by the Lord Himself, ch. viii. 2; it is of His own immediate placing, not belonging to this creation, not only not to this material creation which surrounds us, out of which we get our building materials, but altogether not to this first and present creation: it belongs to the age of the future, to the glorified world." Delitzsch. The rendering "not of this building," A. V., is wrong, and misses the idea, giving in fact a tautological explanation for "not made with hands"; nor yet (as if it were said, "no, nor with any of the typical accompaniments of that other tabernacle") through (as a medium of preparation and approach. The instrumental sense very nearly approaches the local: so that there need be no scruple about the apparently different senses given in the two clauses: see above) blood of goats and calves (the plurals are simply generic: for this portion of the ceremonies of the day of atonement, see Lev. xvi. 14, 15), nay rather (strongly contrasting) through (see above: through, as His medium of entrance: it was as a

Here, as there, the contemporaneous completion of the two acts must be kept in view, and any such rendering as Ebrard's, "in bringing about," carefully avoided) eternal redemption for us (eternal, answering to "once for all" above: as Hofmann remarks, the redemption is the aim and end of the approach of our High Priest to God: if then this approach has once for all taken place, the redemption is therewith for ever accomplished. In the word redemption, as applied to our final redemption at the coming of Christ, the idea of ransom is rather in the background, and that of deliverance prevails over it: but in both, as applied to the redemption which Christ wrought by His death, the idea of price paid for redemption and redemption by that price, is kept prominent. The price paid for our redemption is His death [ver. 15] as the sacrifice of Himself. Titus ii. 14; 1 Tim. ii. 5 f.,—His blood, Eph. i. 7, as the sacrifice of His life, Matt. xx. 28; 1 Pet. i. 19. And here also it is His blood which is the price paid).

eternal Spirit offered HIMSELF (emphatic) without fault to God (first, when did He offer Himself? Clearly not, as Socinus, and others, when he presented himself to God in heaven. For, as Delitzsch rightly observes, when Christ is antitypically or by way of contrast compared with the victims of the Old Test. sacrifices, as the ritual term without fault here shows that He is, then beyond question the offering on the cross is intended, which corresponds to the slaying the victim and offering him on the altar. Besides which, the ‘oblation in the holy place’ was but the completion of the ‘oblation on the altar,’ and, when Christ’s self-offering is spoken of generally, we are to take the whole from the beginning, not merely that which was the last act of it. This will guide us to the meaning of the somewhat difficult words, through the eternal Spirit. The animals which were offered had no will, no spirit of their own, which could concur with the act of sacrifice. Theirs was a transitory life, of no potency or virtue. They were offered through the law rather than through any consent, or agency, or counteragency, of their own. But Christ offered Himself, with His own consent assisting and empowering the sacrifice. And what was that consent? The consent of what? of the spirit of a man? such a consent as yours or mine, given in and through our finite spirit whose acts are bounded by its own allotted space in time and its own responsibilities? No: but the consenting act of His divine Personality—His “eternal Spirit,” His Godhead, which from before time acquiesced in, and wrought with, the redemption-purpose of the Father. Thus we have spirit contrasted with flesh in speaking of our Lord, in several places: see Rom. i. 3, 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 Pet. iii. 18. This divine Personality it was, which in the Resurrection so completely ruled and absorbed His flesh: this, which causes Him to be spoken of by St. Paul in 1 Cor. xv. 45 as a “life-giving Spirit,” and in 2 Cor. iii. 17 f. as absolutely “the Spirit.” Not however that any confusion hence arises in the distinction of the divine Persons: “the eternal Spirit” is not the Spirit of the Father dwelling in Christ, nor is it the Holy Spirit given without measure to Christ, but it is the divine Spirit of the

Godhead which Christ Himself had and was in His inner Personality. And the relevancy of such a clause here is, that the eternal Spirit is absolute spirit, divine spirit, and thus self-conscious, laying down its own course purely of itself unbound by conditions, simply and entirely free: so that Christ’s offering of Himself through the Eternal Spirit, is, as such, a moral act of absolute worth. through, i. e. by virtue of: so that His divine Spirit was the agent in the offering, penetrating and acting on the Humanity. without fault, as above observed, is the regular word of the ritual in reference to the victims which must be without spot when offered. Therefore to understand it of the perfection of the glorified human nature of the ascended Saviour, as the Socinian interpreters, is clearly beside the meaning, and contrary to analogy), purify our (the question of reading, our or your, is one not easy to settle. At the word “purify” we unfortunately lose the evidence of the great Vatican MS.: as it terminates there, and has been completed by a later hand. From all analogy it would seem that we must infer our to have been its reading here) conscience (our English word conscience does not reach the fulness of the term here used, the self-consciousness as regards God, the inner consciousness of relation to Him. This is, by the blood of Christ, shed in the power of the divine Spirit, thoroughly purified, freed from the terror of guilt, cleared from alienation from Him and from all selfish regards and carnal pretences, and rendered living and real as He is living and real) from dead works (just as death was under the old law the fountain of ceremonial pollution, and any one by touching a dead body became unclean, so carnal works, having their origin in sin, with which death is bound up, pollute the conscience. They are like the touching of the dead body, rendering the man unclean in God’s sight, as not springing from life in Him: inducing decay and corruption in the spirit. See on ch. vi. 1, and Chrysostom there quoted. Here, the reference to the dead body can hardly be set aside, being more pointed than there, where I have rather advocated the general sense. The Writer does not here set above at ver. 13. This pre-eminent spiritual virtue of His redeeming blood constitutes his fitness to be the Mediator of the new covenant, the main blessing of which, forgiveness, extends even back over the insufficient former one, and ensures the inheritance to the called. And on this account (on account of this virtue of His blood: or if it seem better, extend the reference further back still, over vv. 11—14, on account of the great work which He hath accomplished by his death: “because these things are so”) is He mediator of a new covenant (see ch. viii. 6 and note), in order that,—death having taken place, for the propitiation of the transgressions under the first covenant,—they who have been called may receive the promise of the eternal inheritance (first, the object of the new covenant is an eternal inheritance,—see ver. 11; ch. ii. 5: and therefore the idea of inheritance having once come in, gives to the word covenant [diathékē] that shade of meaning which is deepened and insisted on below, viz. that of a TESTAMENTARY covenant or arrangement. receiving the promise is to be taken in the sense of receiving the fulfilment of a promise, not merely of having the promise granted. Then, the called are the “partakers in the heavenly calling” of ch. iii. 1: compare also “the high calling” of Phil. iii. 14. Calvin well remarks, “He speaks of the called, that he may the better conciliate the Jews, who were partakers of this calling.” This end, of the called being put in possession of the promise of the eternal inheritance, is to be attained “by death having taken place for the propitiation of the transgressions under the first testament.” Without this death, it could not be attained. The full reason of this, that death must take place first, is presently gone into: it is with the concluding words of this clause that we are at present concerned. These transgressions under the first covenant are in fact those of all mankind. Israel was a pattern of God’s dealings with all: and His revelation of His will to Israel extended categorically to all mankind. Against this will, primævally revealed, revealed to the patriarchs, revealed in the law, our parents and the antediluvian earth, the sons of Noah and the postdiluvian earth, Israel itself as a people, had deeply and repeatedly transgressed: and before a new inheritance by testament could come in, there must be a propitiation of all these former transgressions. All the propitiatory sacrifices, so called, of the former covenant, were but imperfect and typical: but as this is to be a real inheritance, so there must be real and actual propitiation. See the remarkable parallel, Acts xiii. 39).

<sup>16.</sup> For (justification of the death taking place, by an appeal to common usage) where a testament is (that it is quite vain to attempt to deny the testamentary sense of diathékē in this verse, see my Greek Test.), there is necessity that the death of him who made it (the testator, as A. ought to be on Ebrard's, &c. interpretation. In the meaning, Christ is He that made it : and this agrees wonderfully with St. Luke's manner of speaking in that text which is in fact the key-text to this : I appoint unto you, as my Father appointed unto me, a kingdom : the same verb being used as here, Luke xxii. 29) be implied (as literally given, i. e., he who speaks of a testament, at the same time, carries in to, involves in, that assertion, the death of him that made it. On the logical connexion, see below). <sup>17.]</sup>

For (renders a fresh reason within the domain of the former "for," explaining the axiom of ver. 16) a testament is of force (see on ch. ii. 2, and Rom. iv. 16) in the case of the dead (literally, over dead men, the thing predicated being the substratum or condition of the subject. Doubtless in choosing the plural, and indeed the word itself, the Writer has in his mind the transition which he is about to make from the death of the New Testament to the typical deaths of the Old, which were of animals, between which and men dead things, not those who had died, would be the common term), seeing that it (a testament) is never availing when he that made it is alive. <sup>18.]</sup>

Notice that the reference is, here, simply to the first inauguration of the law when it was put forth as new : not to any subsequent renewal of sacrifices by death : this is presently alluded to, vv. 21 ff.) without (apart from, free from the exhibition of) blood.

mandment had been spoken according to the law (these last words, according to the law, belong not to precept, but to spoken, spoken according to the law, i. e., as the law directed, not varying from it in any point) by Moses to all the people (see Exod. xxiv. 3), taking the blood (the additional detail of Exod. xxiv. 5 is omitted, viz. that "he sent young men of the children of Israel, which offered burnt-offerings, and sacrificed peace-offerings of oxen unto the Lord.") It was of this blood that Moses took) of the calves and goats (the former only are mentioned in Exodus. But this is only said of the peace-offerings. The burnt-offerings [see above], after the analogy of the rites on the day of atonement, might be presumed to be goats. Indeed the key to the additions made here to the text of Exodus is, that the account is filled up by subsequent usage. We may presume, that the solemn legal appointment of various ceremonial details was in fact only a divine sanction of practices already existing : sacrifice having been long in use, and that under the direction and approval of God Himself), with water (prescribed, in Numb. xix. 6, 17, to be mixed with the ashes of the red heifer which were to be kept for purifying : compare also Lev. xiv. 50 f. : see above), and scarlet wool, and hyssop (see Lev. xiv. 49 ff. : by comparing which with Numb. xix. as above, it may fairly be inferred, as our text here assures us was the fact, that these instruments where the ordinary ones in cleansing and sprinkling, even before their positive enactment as such by the law. The most approved makes it to be a plant growing on walls, 'hyssopus officinalis,' with small lancet-formed woolly leaves, about an inch long, a knotty stalk from 1 to 1½ foot high, with blue [sometimes white] flowers), he sprinkled both the book itself (nothing is said of this in Exod. xxiv. The book is of course that out of which he had just read the ordinances of God. If, as Stier supposes, Moses took the book [Exod. xxiv. 7] from off the altar where it was lying when he sprinkled the altar with blood, then the book was sprinkled likewise: but nothing in the text of Exodus implies this), and all the people (of course the words all the people are not to be taken to mean that he sprinkled every individual; but merely the whole mass, as they stood), saying, This is the blood of the testament (in Exod. xxiv. 8, "Behold the blood . . ." It has been suggested, that the change has been made by the Writer after the tenor of the New Test. inauguration of the testament by our Lord, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood," Luke xxii. 20) which God (in Exod. xxiv. 8, "the Lord;" Jehovah: changed apparently to preserve more completely the Old Test. character of the saying) commanded in regard to you (it is much disputed, how the logic of this passage can cohere: seeing that how properly soever the latter diatheke may be spoken of and argued on as being a testament, the former one could have no such character, and consequently cannot be thus argued on. And the question is very variously answered according to the standing point of different Commentators. The matter seems to stand thus. The word diatheke has the double sense of a covenant and a testament. Both these senses may be applied to both covenants: to the latter more properly belongs the testamentary sense, but to the former also in as far as it was typical of and foreshadowed the other. In the latter, all is clear. Christ, the heir of all things, has bequeathed to us His people an everlasting inheritance; has died, sealing the testament with His blood. In the former all this is formally, though inadequately represented. The inheritance, faintly shadowed forth by temporal possessions, had yet a recognized blessed meaning far beyond those possessions: the testator was imperfectly, but still was formally represented by the animals slain in sacrifice: there was a death, there was a sprinkling of and sealing by blood: and surely it requires no more stretch of concession to acknowledgè the victim in sacrifice to represent the Lamb of God in his sonship and his heritorship, than it does in his innocence and propitiatory power. The one idea is just as poorly and inadequately set forth by it as the other. But in both cases there is an inheritance, and in both it is the same. In both it is bequeathed: in the latter actually by One who has come in person and died: in the former, only typically, by the same One ceremonially present. So that, if our whence in ver. 18 were to be filled up, it would be, "Whence, i. e. since the former covenant also had its testamentary side, and thus was analogous to as well as typical of the latter." The charge brought against the Writer on account of his transition of meaning in diatheke, is equally without foundation. He is thinking in Greek. In Greek, the word has these two meanings: not divided off from one another by any such line of demarcation as when expressed by two separate words, but both lying under one and the same word. What more common, or more ordinarily accepted, than to educe out of some one word its various shades of meaning, and argue on each separately as regards the matter in hand? Take the very word "Testament" as an example. In our common parlance it now means a book; the Old Testament, the book of the former covenant, the New Testament, the book of the latter. But we do not therefore sink the other and deeper meaning; nay, we rather insist on it, that it may not become lost in that other and more familiar one. I cannot see how the Writer's method of

21.] And moreover he in like manner sprinkled with the blood the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry (this cannot be spoken of the same occasion as that referred to in the previous verses: for at that time the tabernacle did not exist. Nor again can it be said of any practice of sprinkling with blood which existed throughout the legal ordinances: for the tense in the original shews the reference to be to some one act, and the subject of the verb is, as before, Moses. This being so, we must look beyond the ordinances of the law itself for the fact here detailed. For all that we have in the law respecting the dedication of the tabernacle and its vessels is in Exod. xl. 9, 10, where Moses is commanded to take the anointing oil, and to anoint the tabernacle and all that is therein, and to hallow it, and all the vessels thereof. So that our Writer is probably referring to some traditional account, which added to this anointing with oil, the sprinkling with blood. And this is not merely a hypothesis. For Josephus gives an account agreeing with ours almost verbatim. In Levit. viii. 30, from which the account of anointing Aaron and his sons is taken, distinct mention is made of sprinkling on them, and on their garments, the blood which was on the altar. It was a natural addition, to extend that sprinkling to the tabernacle and its vessels: especially as [Levit. ver. 15] the altar was already to be touched with the blood). 22.] And almost (one may say, that) in [with] blood all things are purified (there is a combination throughout of the ideas of the inheritance by testament, whereof the death is a condition, and the purification by covenant, whereof the death is the efficient cause. The combination is not a rhetorical figure in the mind of the Writer, but a deep truth in the verity of God. The same Death which purifies us from guilt, makes us partakers of the kingdom of glory; the same Blood which cleanses us from sin, seals the testament of our inheritance.

The fact that almost in all cases the law purified by blood, provides for such exceptions as Exod. xix. 10; Lev. xv. 5 ff.; xvi. 26, 28; xxii. 6; Numb. xxxi. 22—24) according to the law (i.e. receive legal purification); and that apart from shedding (literally, pouring out) of blood (there has been a question, whether this pouring out imports the shedding of blood in the slaughter of the victims, or the pouring out of the blood at the foot of the altar, so often enjoined in the ordinances of legal sacrifice. "It seems most probable that the Writer here has the shedding of blood in mind. It would not by any means follow, that he treats this blood-shedding as a propitiation. He does not directly call it the medium of forgiveness, he says only, that apart from it there was no remission, that it is the indispensable means to obtain the expiatory life's blood. . . . One thing which determines the reference to be to the shedding of blood, is the expression, 'which is being shed for you,' in the institution of the Lord's Supper in Luke xxii. 20,—at all events the close parallel in word and in thought to this. It is hardly probable that the Writer would mean a pouring out of blood, of which that so called on Christ's part is not the antitype: not to say that since ver. 13, blood and death have been ideas most closely connected," Delitzsch) there cometh not (taketh not place) remission (viz. of sins. As to the fact, Lev. xvii. 11 sufficiently proves it: and the Rabbis deduced from that passage an axiom almost verbatim the same as our text: "There is no expiation except through blood." The case of the poor man, who cannot afford the animal victim, Lev. v. 11—13, seems to present an exception, and to justify the application of the "one may almost say" to this clause).

23.] There [was] (more probably than 'is' seeing that he was before speaking, not of the renewed cleansing year by year, but of the solemn inauguration: and much more, now that he is coming to speak of the heavenly sanctuary, must he be asserting a necessity not of continually renewed cleansing, but of a past one, once for all) necessity therefore (this first inference follows from the facts just mentioned: and is introduced only to lead the way to the second, "but the heavenly things themselves, &c.," which itself is a conclusion from the analogy between type and antitype, and is the converse of the proposition of verses 13, 14) that the delineations (or figures; not, "patterns:" at least not in the present acceptation of that word. The heavenly things themselves would be the patterns, or antitypes. See on ch. viii. 5) of the things in the heavens (i. e. of the heavenly tabernacle with its contents: see below) should be purified (for the "dedication" was in fact not only an inauguration, but a purification likewise: and the proposition of ver. 22,—"wherever there is remission, there is blood-shedding,"—will bear converting,—wherever there is a sprinkling with blood, there is remission, and consequently, purification) with these (i. e. not the various purifications mentioned up to this time, the ashes of the red heifer included; for these last were never used to purify the tabernacle or its vessels: nor again, "blood and the like," e. g. the oil which was used with it; for this has not been mentioned: nor, with such things, viz. Levitical ordinances, which is far too vague. It is the blood, and that only, which is meant: the plural being used most probably to indicate the animals slain, the "goats and calves"); but the heavenly things themselves (i. e. heaven and the things therein: see the next verse, of which Bleek well remarks, that the junction to this by "for" can only then be valid when those words refer to the same as our "heavenly things themselves." But it has appeared difficult to Commentators to understand, how heaven itself should need this cleansing. Consequently various expedients have been adopted: and various meanings given, which I have discussed in my Greek Test., and have found all equally futile. We must rest in the plain and literal sense:

that the heaven itself needed, and obtained, purification by the atoning blood of Christ. And if we enquire how this could be, we may find an answer in reflecting on the consequence of man's sin on the mind and aspect of God towards him. That unclouded benignity wherewith the Creator contemplated his creation, Gen. i. 31, had become overcast by the divine anger on account of sin, but was again restored by Him in whom the Father was well pleased, the darkness being by His blood turned into light, the frown into an eternal smile. So Delitzsch beautifully: "If I see aright, the meaning of the Writer is, in its ground-thought, this: the supernal holiest place, i. e. as ver. 24 shews, heaven itself, the uncreated eternal heaven of God, although in itself untroubled light, yet needed a purification in so far as the light of Love towards man was, so to speak, out-flared and obscured by the fire of wrath against sinful man; and the heavenly tabernacle, i. e. the place of God's revealing of His majesty and grace for angels and men, needed a purification, in so far as men had rendered this place, which was destined for them from the beginning, unapproachable by reason of their sin, and so it must be changed into an approachable place of manifestation of a God gracious to men") with sacrifices (categorical plural of an abstract proposition: not therefore implying that the sacrifice was repeated: applicable in its reality, only to the one Sacrifice of the body of Christ once for all, and most emphatically designating that as a sacrifice) better than (see on ch. i. 4) these.

<sup>24.</sup> He now reasserts, under the fuller light which has since been cast upon it, that which was enounced in verses 11, 12, and by it shews at what the term heavenly places above pointed. In fact, as Delitzsch observes, the proposition of vv. 11, 12, has been in course of elucidation ever since: in vv. 13, 14, he explained "through his own blood," in vv. 15—23 the "high priest of the good things to come," and now the "entered once for all into the holy place." For (resumption of the heavenly things above) not into

The true, genuine holy places are those in heaven, where God's presence is manifested. See below); but into the heaven itself (none of the heavens, all of which the Lord has gone through, ch. iv. 14,—but the very holiest place, where God peculiarly reveals Himself, and which is uncreated. Delitzsch quotes from Sebastian Schmidt, "The heaven into which Christ hath entered is not any form of the created heaven, but the heaven in which God is irrespective of any created heaven,—the very divine glory itself." Hence what follows), now (in the present dispensation: almost equivalent to henceforth. It is an anticipation of the next verse) to be manifested (as to the peculiar propriety of the term to be made manifest. It is one found mostly in St. Luke (Acts). It is there principally in the sense of making manifest, giving information: in Matt. xxviii. 53, it is used of the bodies of the saints appearing to many: and in John xiv. 21, 22, of Jesus manifesting himself to his people. But the key-text to the understanding of it here is Exod. xxxiii. 13. Moses desired to advance beyond the mere vision of God, and prayed "manifest thyself to me" [so in the Greek of the Septuagint, the same verb being used as here]. This, which might not be granted to Moses [nor to any man, compare Lev. xvi. 13]—this open sight of God, is that which takes place between the Father and the Son. "None knoweth the Son but the Father." There is no veil hiding the Father's face from the Son: so completely does this manifestation take place, that he is the perfect image of the Father: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father:" "No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him") to (before) the face of God (see Rev. xxii. 4, where it is said that the servants of God shall see His face) for us (this is the intent of His entrance into the heavenly sanctuary, to appear and to plead for us: see ch. vii. 25. "He brings before the face of God no offering which has exhausted itself and, as only sufficing for a time, needs renewal; but He himself is in person our offering, and by virtue of the eternal Spirit, i. e. of the imperishable life of His person, now for ever freed from death, our eternally present offering before God." Delitzsch). 25—28.] In ver. 24, His having entered into a mere typical sanctuary was denied: now it is denied, that His sacrifice needs, as those others did, to be repeated continually. Nor yet (did He enter into heaven) that He may (i. e. with this intent, to) oftentimes offer Himself (before God in the holiest place: continue, as those High Priests, year by year coming in before the face of God in His sanctuary. This offering himself is not to be understood of Christ's death, nor confounded, as many have done, with his suffering, below: see there), just as the (Jewish) High Priest entereth into the holy (holiest) place year by year with (literally, in: not instrumental, but elemental: he enters, furnished with, as it were clad with, that which follows. We use our "in" of even the lesser articles of personal wear in a similar sense: "a man in spectacles") blood of others (i. e. foundation of the world: but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the

brought in in the argumentation below): since (in that case) it were necessary that He should oftentimes suffer (not, 'have suffered,' as A. V.; by it were necessary we are already carried back to a time antecedent to the supposed repeated acts indicated by suffering, and therefore do not need another carrying back in time. Notice, as against the Commentators mentioned above under the words "offer Himself," and others, that this suffering is here not equivalent to that offering, but is emphatically placed as a new necessity, involved in that; the often being common to both: the often offering necessitated the often suffering. If Christ's view in entering heaven was, to offer, present, himself often to God, then, as a condition of that frequent presentation, there would be an antecedent necessity for Him to suffer often: because that self-presentation is in fact the bringing in before God of the Blood of that his suffering: and if the one was to be renewed, so must the other be likewise. So that the meaning is not, that Christ must again and again have descended on earth and died. To such a descent there is no allusion, as there is none to a renewed entrance into the holy places in heaven. That entrance Christ has effected once for all: this lies, as a 'fait accompli,' at the ground of the hypothesis. But the rejected hypothesis is, that once being in the celestial holy place, Christ intended to renew often his oblation of Himself. And in that case, says our Writer, it would be necessary that He should often suffer, often die: because each such oblation necessitated as its condition a corresponding suffering. When, as in the case of the Jewish high priests, the blood was that of others, such repetition was possible [see Lev. xvi. 14, 15]: but not so, when the blood was His own) since the foundation of the world (why this addition? Not, as often understood, so as to bring under the merits of the Suffering, all the sins of mankind past as well as future,—which thought arising from the erroneous view of a frequently-repeated entrance into heaven being supposed, has nothing whatever to do with the argument; but, inasmuch as the theatre of Christ's sufferings is of necessity this present world, pointing out that those supposed repeated sufferings must necessarily in that case take place within the temporal limits indicated by the phrase "from the foundation of the world:" that such sufferings would be spread over the space of time from the foundation of the world till He entered into the presence of God, each oblation of Himself there being the sequel of, and conditioned by, one such suffering since the world has been. I may mention, that no parenthesis is here admissible. The words of this clause are strictly and indispensably a link in the argument): now, however (now, not temporal, but meaning, "as the state of the case is"), once (for all without need of renewal) at (as close upon, put in immediate contiguity with) the end of the ages of time (i. e. when the whole period above indicated by from the foundation of the world is gathered up and brought to an end. Between the first and second coming of Christ, the New Test. Scriptures know of no intermediate interposition of the divine dealings with men: in Him we are perfect, and at His appearing, our ages had their accomplishment. All these centuries which have been since, are merely the lengthening out of the time in the mercy of God. The first Christians universally spoke of the second coming of the Lord as close at hand, as indeed it ever was and is: the fallings are sacrificed, and all is ready: but the long-suffering of God waits while the guests are being gathered in: or, in the other view of His coming, while the ark is a preparing) hath He been manifested (viz. at His first coming in our flesh: the manifestation in the flesh, spoken of 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 Pet. i. 20. On the other meaning given, see below) for the putting away of sin (see ch. vii. 18 note: putting away, i. e. abrogation, "both of the guilt and power of sin") by means of His sacrifice (i. e. in the sense, 'the sacrifice of Himself,' but not here so expressed in the original. ferently taken. Some understand "hath been manifested" of His appearance before God. But this cannot be for a moment maintained. Analogy is wholly against it, and so is the second appearance, mentioned below: not to mention that had it been so, we should certainly have had before God, or some such qualification, added).

27, 28.] It is shewn by a comparison with our human lot in general, of which Christ, Himself man, is partaker, that this often suffering (dying) and often offering Himself, has no place: that as in our case, we die once only, and after that comes the judgment, for us who are to be judged, so for Him there was one death from sin, and after that no repetition of it, but the judgment, for Him who is to judge. But in this latter member of the comparison, the bright and saving side only is put forward (see below): it is not said he shall appear to judge the world, but He shall appear without sin (and therefore with no more purpose to expiate sin) to them that wait for Him, unto salvation: these last words carrying with them a hortatory force, that the readers might thus wait for Him.

27.] And inasmuch as (seeing that Christ is not only a fit object of comparison with man, but is man) it is appointed to men (all men) once (and no more) to die, and after that, judgment (not necessarily here to be taken on its unfavourable side: the word is perfectly general: nor is there, as Bolme imagined, any opposition between men here and those that wait for Him below. Such opposition indeed would mar the whole context, which has a totally different object, and deals with the general and inevitable fate of all men indiscriminately. Nor again must the question, whether judgment is spoken of as immediately to follow death, or after an interval, be imported into the consideration of the text. The indefinite after that does not admit of any such question being raised. Next to death, with no more like events between, comes judgment: this is the fact contemplated—the appointed destiny of man, according to which that of the man Christ Jesus also, as far as it is applicable to Him, is apportioned): so also the Christ (not Christ, without the article, but the Christ, that man who was God's Christ—the Christ, it being plain and palpable to all that the Christ belongs to the category, men. In ver. 24, the case was different), once (for all) having been offered (not the same as 'having offered himself.' The form and the meaning are both passive; and the reason of this is, I believe, to be found in the fact that it is in this verse not so much the agency, as the destiny of Christ, that is spoken of; that which, though the expression itself is avoided with regard to Him, is appointed for Him as for us. It is hardly necessary to mention, that the very terms of the context here necessitate the understanding this offering of the death of Christ,—not as in ver. 25, where the context, as there insisted, confines it to His offering of Himself to God in the heavenly sanctuary) to bear the sins of many (a plain allusion to Isa. liii. 12: and here, as there, importing the "bearing," "carrying on Himself;" see also Lev. xxiv. 15, "Whosoever curseth his God shall bear his sin;" Numb. v. 31, "The woman shall bear her iniquity;" xiv. 34, "Each day for a year shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years." And so in ver. 33, "shall bear your whoredoms." On many, and its supposed contrast to all, see above, ch. ii. 10, and Schlichting's true distinction, "Many is opposed here, not to all, but to few." Many is, as Delitzsch says, the qualitative designation of all: all men are many in number. There is reference in it to "once for all:" He was offered, One, for all: and once for all, shall appear (the usual verb of the appearances of Christ after his resurrection) a second time without (separate from) sin (in order to understand this, we must remember what it is that the Writer is proving: viz. that Christ's death, the repetition of which would be the condition of a repeated offering of Himself in heaven to God, admits of no such repetition. It was a death in which He bore the sins of many—but He shall appear the second time with no sin upon Him, and consequently the whole work of atonement done and accomplished by that first offering. So that there is no need of any far-fetched explanation, either of sin, or of without sin. At His first appearance in the world He came with sin, not in him, but on him: He was made to be sin: but this sin has been once for all taken away by his bearing it as our Sacrifice: and at his second appearance He shall appear without, having done with, separate from, sin), to them that wait for Him,—unto (to bring in: for the purpose of) salvation (these last words belong to shall appear, not, to them that wait for Him). The object of Christ's second appearance shall be, to bring in salvation; this is the bright and Christian side of His appearing, the side which we, who ought to be waiting for Him, should ever look upon).

CHAP. X. 1—18.] SOLEMN CONCLUSION OF THE ARGUMENT: 1) Christ's voluntary self-offering, as contrasted with the yearly offerings of victims under the law, is the carrying out of God's real will (vv. 1—10): 2) Christ's priestly service, in contrast to the daily repeated service of the priests of the law, is for ever perfected by one high-priestly act, which has issued in His Kingly exaltation and waiting till His foes be subdued under Him (vv. 11—14): 3) Christ's finished work is the inauguration of that new covenant before referred to, in which, the law being written on the heart, and sin put away and forgotten, there is no more need for sin-offering (vv. 15—18). And so, as Delitzsch observes, in this passage the leading thoughts of the whole argument are brought together in one grand finale, just as in the finale of a piece of music all the hitherto scattered elements are united in an effective whole. 1—10.] See above.

sage, ch. ix. 24—28: hitherto has been shewn the impossibility of Christ's offering being repeated as were those of the law: now is to be shewn its absolute perfection as compared with those of the law) the law having (as it has; the participle has a reasoning force, which passes on upon what follows) a shadow (or, 'the shadow,' which in sense would be much the same. The putting forward of the word to the beginning of the sentence would render it anarthrous. I prefer, however, 'a shadow,' because of the meaning of the word, presently to be treated of: see below) of the good things to come (viz. the same good things of which, in ch. ix. 11, Christ is said to be the High Priest,—which belong to the "age to come" of ch. vi. 5, whose powers are working in the present dispensation,—and to the completion of the "world to come" of ch. ii. 5: the good things which are still future to us as they were to those under the law, but are now made sure to us in and by Christ), not the very image of the things (every representation of good things to come must be an image, whether it be in words, or in types, or in any other method of representation. The full description and entire revelation of the things thus designated will be "the very image" of the things: which we possess in the gospel covenant: the very setting forth and form of the heavenly realities themselves. But the law had no such "image" constructed out of the heavenly realities themselves: it had merely a shadow, merely a rough sketch or outline), year by year with the same sacrifices (in the A. V. the words year by year are placed in the next clause. But there is no need to disturb the plain order of the sentence, in which year by year belongs to the verb, "can never." "This," says Delitzsch, "is more accordant with the sense of the Writer: for he does not say, that the law by means of the offerings which were always the same year by year never was able to perfect, &c.,—but that the law, year by year, by the repetition of the same offerings, testified its inability to perfect, &c., viz. on the day of atonement, on which the same expiatory

It will be evident that the words with the same sacrifices must refer, not to the daily offerings, but to those of propitiation on the great day of atonement) which they (the ministering priests) offer continually (the offering of these sacrifices is looked upon as continuous, being unbroken from year to year. When I say, "the celebration of the day of atonement continued unbroken till the destruction of Jerusalem," I use the same method of expression) never (not even at any time) is able to perfect (see on ch. ii. 10, where I have entered into the meanings of this verb, to perfect, in our Epistle) those who draw near (to God, by means of them).

that on account of inherent defect in the sacrifices themselves. For it is impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sin (the Writer by no means denies the typical virtue of the Old Test. sacrifices, but asserts that which the schoolmen explained by saying that they wrought remission of sin not "by their proper virtue," but "by an accident," viz. by means of something not inherent in them, viz. the grace of the true Propitiation which was to come, and of faith directed to it. And thus only is it said, Lev. xvii. 11, that the blood upon the altar makes an atonement for the soul: it was shed, as Ebrard well observes, not as the instrument of complete vicarious propitiation, but as an exhibition of the postulate of vicarious propitiation).

5—10.] Christ's voluntary self-offering shewn to be the perfect fulfilment of the will of God. Wherefore (seeing that the animal sacrifices of the Old Test. had no power to take away sin, and that for that end a nobler sacrifice was wanting) coming into the world, he saith (first, on the citation from Ps. xl. That Psalm, which is inscribed "A Psalm of David," seems to be a general retrospect, in some time of trouble, of God's former mercies to him, and of his own course of loving obedience as distinguished from mere expression of outward thankfulness by sacrifice and offering. Thus understood, there will be no difficulty in the direct application of its words to Him, of whose sufferings and of whose obedience all human experiences in suffering and

Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me: 6 in burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure. 7 Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me,) to do thy will, O God. 8 Above when he said, Sacrifice and offering and burnt offerings and offering for sin thou wouldst not, neither hadst pleasure

obeying are but a faint resemblance. I have entered on this subject in speaking of the Messianic citation in ch. ii., and need not lay down again the principles there contended for, further than to say, that the more any son of man approaches, in position, or office, or individual spiritual experience, the incarnate Son of God, the more directly may his holy breathings in the power of Christ's Spirit be taken as the utterances of Christ Himself. And of all men, the prophet-king of Israel thus resembled and out-shadowed Him the most. The Psalm itself seems to belong to the time of David's persecution by Saul; and the sentiment of this portion of it is, as Delitzsch observes, an echo of Samuel's saying to Saul in 1 Sam. xv. 22,—“Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord?” Next, what is when he cometh into the world? It expresses, I believe, the whole time during which the Lord, being ripened in human resolution, was in intent devoting himself to the doing of his Father's will: the time of which that youthful question, “Wist ye not that I must be among the things of my Father?” was one of the opening announcements. See also Isa. vii. 16), Sacrifice (of slain animals) and offering (of any kind) thou wouldst not (similar declarations are found frequently in the Old Test., and mostly in the prophets: see Ps. l. 7—15; li. 16 f.; Isa. i. 11; Jer. vi. 20; vii. 21—23; Hos. vi. 6; Amos v. 21 ff.; Micah vi. 6—8), but a body didst thou prepare for me (in the Hebrew, “mine ears hast thou opened,” i. e. to hear and obey Thee. The idea of there being any allusion to the custom of boring through the ear of a slave who voluntarily remained subject to his master, Exod. xxi. 6: Deut. xv. 17, seems to be a mistake. The difficulty is, how such a clause can be rendered by a body hast thou prepared for me, as it is in the Septuagint. The various solutions of this difficulty, and their unsatisfactory nature, may be seen in my Greek Test. I would leave the difficulty an unsolved one, not being satisfied by either of the above views, and having no other to propound. As Christian believers, our course is plain. How the word body came into the Septuagint version, we cannot say: but being there, it is now sanctioned for us by the citation here: not as the, or even a proper rendering of the Hebrew, but as a prophetic utterance, equivalent to and representing that other): whole burnt-offerings (offerings of whole animals to be burnt on the altar) and (sacrifices) for sin thou didst not approve. Then I said (viz. when Thou hadst prepared a body for me), Behold, I am come, in the volume of the book it is written concerning me, to do, O God, thy will (the connexion and construction are somewhat differently given from those in the Septuagint, Hebrew, and A.V. See the passage in the A.V. volume, as its name imports, is a roll). 8.] The Writer now proceeds to expound the prophecy; and in so doing, cites it again, but in a freer form, and one accommodated to the explanation which he gives. Saying (as he does) above, that (mere particle of recitation, not expressed in an English version) sacrifices and offerings and whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices concerning sin thou wouldst not, nor yet didst approve (observe that the two distinct clauses of the previous citation are now combined, for the sake of throwing into contrast the rejection of legal sacrifices and the acceptable self-sacrifice of the Son of God); of such sort as (the word used does not, like the simple relative, identify, but classifies, the antecedent) are (habitually) offered according to (in pursuance of) the law; then (more logical than chronological; but used probably in allusion to that then above, in the passage itself) hath he said, Behold, I am come to do thy will. He (Christ again) taketh away the first (the sacrifices), that he may set up (establish) the second (the will of God).

10.] In (the course of, the fulfilment of: not properly “by:” the instrumentality belongs more to the offering, mentioned below) which will (viz. the will and purpose of God towards us by Christ: the will which He came to fulfil. There is no real difference, between the will of God to redeem us by the sufferings and death of Christ, and the will of God as fulfilled by Christ’s obedience: the one includes the other: the latter was the condition of the former) we have been sanctified (see on the word to sanctify, and on the use of the present and past passive participles of it, note on ch. ii. 11. Here the perfect is used, inasmuch as it is the finished work of Christ in its potentiality, not the process of it on us, which is spoken of: see ver. 14: that final completion is here indicated by the perfect). through the offering of the body (some read, “of the blood.” But this would, besides losing the reference to the words, “a body hast thou prepared me,” introduce an inaccuracy into the typology. It is by the Blood of Christ that we are reconciled to God, but by the offering of His Body that we are made holy. The one concerns our acceptance as acquitted from sin; the other our perfection in holiness by union with Him and participation in His Spirit. Thus we distinguish the two in the Communion Service: “that our sinful bodies may be made clean by His Body, and our souls washed through His most precious Blood”) of Jesus Christ once for all (this is to be taken with the words, “the offering, &c.,” not with “we have been sanctified,” as is done by many. See the discussion in my Greek Test.).

11—14.] See summary at ver. 1. And (introduces a new particular of contrast: ‘and besides’) every high priest (much has of late been said against the reading high priest, as bringing in an inaccuracy which our Writer could not be guilty of, seeing that the high priests did not officiate in the daily sacrifice. But all such arguments are worthless against our most ancient MSS., and tend indeed the other way, viz. to shew how natural it was to alter high priest to priest, on account of this very difficulty. With regard to the alleged inaccuracy, I really think that if closely viewed, it will prove rather to be a fine and deep touch of truth. The high priesthood of our Lord is to be compared with that of the Jewish legal high priests. On the one side is Jesus, alone in the glory of his office and virtue of his sacrifice; on the other is the Jewish high priesthood, not one man but many, by reason of death; represented in all its acts, personal or delegated, by its holder for the time, by “every high priest,” offering not one, but many sacrifices. This High Priest is the representative of the whole priesthood. Whether he ministered in the daily service of the temple himself or not, it is he who embodies the acts and sufferings of Israel in his own person. How Delitzsch can say that such an idea is foreign alike to the Bible and the Jewish mind, I am at a loss to understand, considering the liberation at the death of the High Priest, not to insist on the ceremonies themselves at the day of atonement, when he was clearly the centre and representative of the priest-

In treating of the Head of so compact a system as the Jewish priesthood, it is clearly allowable, if any where, to bring in the principle, that he who acts by another acts himself. See ch. vii. 27, where the very same daily service is predicated of the high priest) standeth (no priest nor other person might sit in the inner court of the temple, except the king. There is perhaps more than a fortuitous contrast to "sat down" below: the one posture being proper to worshipping, the other to being worshipped, as Chrysostom remarks) day by day ministering (see note, ch. viii. 2) and (brings out that in the service, which the Writer wishes most to emphasize) often offering the same sacrifices, the which (i. e. of a sort which, such as) can never take away (literally, "strip off all round." Such a word is peculiarly fitting to express the removal of that of which it is said, ch. v. 2, "He is surrounded with infirmity," and which is called, ch. xii. 1, "sin which is easily [naturally] cast about us." The sacrifice might bring sense of partial forgiveness: but it could never denude the offerer of sinfulness—strip off and take away his guilt) sins: <sup>12.]</sup> but He ('this [man],<sup>1</sup> or, [priest]: but such rendering should be avoided if possible, as should all renderings which import a new generic idea into the text, as always causing confusion: see for a notable example, 1 Cor. ii. 11 end, in A. V.—where there is nothing corresponding to "man" in the original), having offered one sacrifice for sins for ever (for ever may be joined either with the preceding or with the following words. See the matter discussed in my Greek Test. It will there be seen that I incline to join them with what follows, but would leave it an open question. My ground is that the words seem better to refer to an enduring state, than to a past act. The objection taken to this arrangement, above, that there will be change in the nature of a session at the end, when all things shall have been put under His feet, may be met by saying that such change, being obviously included in His ultimate state of reception into God's presence in heaven, does not here count as a change, where the question is of renewal of sacrifice, with regard to which that session is eternal) sat down on the right hand of God; henceforth waiting until his enemies be placed as footstool of his feet (there is no real discrepancy between this passage and 1 Cor. xv. 23–26. If this seems to date the subjection of all to Christ before the second advent, and that places it after the same event, we may well say, that the second advent is not here taken into account by the Writer,—whose object is the contrast between the suffering and triumphant Christ,—as it is by St. Paul, who is specially giving an account of the resurrection, which is so inseparably bound up with that advent. The second advent is no break in Christ's waiting till his enemies be subdued to him, but it is the last step but one of that subjection; the last of all being the subjection of Himself, and his mystical Body with him, to Him that did put all things under him. For among the enemies are His own elect, who were enemies: and they are not thoroughly subject to Him, till He with them is subject to the Father, the mediatorial veil being withdrawn, and the One God being all in all). <sup>14.]</sup> And He need not renew his sacrifice: For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them who are being sanctified ("the Writer says not 'them that are being perfected,' but 'them that are being sanctified.' purification from sins [for both these are alike contained in the idea], is the way whereby the objective perfection already provided in the self-sacrifice of Christ gradually renders itself subjective in men." (Delitzsch).

15—18.] See summary at ver. 1. The prophetic word testifies the same, making absolute and final forgiveness of sins a characteristic of the new Covenant. Moreover the Holy Spirit also testifies to us (Christians in general): for after having said (then the citation proceeds much as in ch. viii. 10 ff. with some differences, noticed below. On the common points, see notes there), This is the covenant which I will make with them (in viii. 10, "with the house of Israel." Here the prophecy is taken out of its national limits and universalized) after those days, saith the Lord, giving my laws into their hearts (ch. viii. 10, "their mind"), and on their mind ("their heart," ch. viii. 10) will I inscribe them (now comes the finish of the sentence after the words "after that he had said before:" a whole clause, expressed in ch. viii. 10, 11, being omitted [see below], he further says); and, their sins and their transgressions will I remember no more (ver. 17 carries the whole burden of the citation with it. This is the object of the citation, to prove that there needs no more sacrifice for sins. And the previous portion of it is adduced to shew that this, the oblivion of sins, does form an integral part of the prophecy of the introduction of the new and spiritual covenant).

18.] But (or, now: it is the 'but' of the demonstration, referring to a well-known axiomatic fact as contrasting with the contrary hypothesis) where there is remission of these, there is no longer offering concerning sin.

"Here ends the finale (x. 1—18) of the great tripartite arrangement (vii. 1—25, vii. 26—ix. 12, ix. 13—x. 18) of the middle portion of the Epistle. 'Christ a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec,' this was its great theme, now brought to a conclusion. That the Priesthood of Christ, as Melchisedecite, is as high above the Levitical as God's heaven is above the earth,—that Christ, with His One High-priestly self-sacrifice, has accomplished that which the Levitical priesthood with its sacrifices was unable to accomplish,—that henceforth, both our present possession of salvation, and our future completion of salvation, are as certain to us as that He is with God, ruling as a Priest and reigning as a King, once more to appear, no more as a bearer of our sins, but in glory as a Judge;—these are the three great fundamental thoughts, now brought to their full development. What it is, to be a high priest after the order of Melchisedec and not of Aaron, is set forth, ch. vii. 1—25. That Christ however as High Priest is Aaron's antitype, ruling in the true holy place by virtue of His self-sacrifice here on earth,—and Mediator of a better covenant, whose essential character the old covenant only shadowed forth and typified, we learn, vii. 26—ix. 12. And that the self-sacrifice of Christ, offered through the eternal Spirit, is of everlasting power, as contrasted with the unavailing cycle of legal offerings, is established in the third part, ix. 13—x. 18: the second half of this portion, x. 1—18, being devoted to a reiterated and conclusive treatment of the main position of the whole,—the High Priesthood of Christ, grounded on His offering of Himself,—its Kingly character, its eternal accomplishment of its end, confirmed by Ps. xl. Ps. ex.; Jer. xxxi." Delitzsch.

CHAP. X. 19—XIII.] THE THIRD GREAT DIVISION OF THE EPISTLE: OUR DUTY IN THE INTERVAL OF WAITING BETWEEN THE BEGINNING AND ACCOMPLISHMENT OF OUR SALVATION. And herein, x. 19—39, exhortation to enter boldly into the holiest place, 19—22: to hold fast our profession, 23: to stir up one another, 24, 25: in consideration of the fearful punishment which awaits the rejectors of Christ, 26—31: and in remembrance of the previous sufferings which they underwent when first converted, 32—34. Finally, exhortation not to cast away confidence, for the time until His coming is short, and during that time, faith is the life of the soul.

There has been no exhortation, properly speaking, since ch. vii. 1, i. e. during the great doctrinal argument of the Epistle. Before that, argument and exhortation were rapidly alternated. But so exquisite is the skill of arrangement and development, that the very exhortation with which he closed the former portion of the Epistle, where first he began to prepare the way for his great argument, ch. iv. 14—16, is now resumed, deepened indeed and expanded by the intervening demonstration, but in spirit and substance the same: “let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith” here, answering to “let us approach with boldness to the throne of grace” there, and “let us hold fast the confession of our hope” here, to “let us hold fast our confession” there.

19.] Having (placed first as carrying the emphasis: “possessing, as we do . . .”) therefore (as above proved: it collects and infers), brethren (see on ch. iii. 1), confidence (see on ch. iii. 6) as regards the (our: see below) entering into the holy place in (or, by: see below) the blood of Jesus (He having once entered in with His blood as our High Priest, and thereby all atonement and propitiation having been for ever accomplished, it is in that blood that our boldness to enter in is grounded. To understand in, with Bleek and Stier, as in ch. ix. 25, is in fact to make us, as priests, renew Christ’s offering of Himself. “We enter,” says Stier, “with the blood of Jesus, even with the same, wherewith He entered before us:” which is very like a contradiction in terms, and is at all events inaccurate theology. We do not take the blood of Christ with us into the presence of God: it is there already once for all, and our confidence of access is therein grounded, that it is there. See note on ch. xii. 24), which He initiated (first opened: better than A. V. ‘consecrated,’ which seems as if it existed before) for us, (as) a way recent (new, ‘of late origin.’ “None before Him trod this way; no believer under the Old Test. dared or could, though under a dispensation of preparatory grace, approach God so freely and openly, so fearlessly and joyfully, so closely and intimately, as we now, who come to the Father by the blood of Jesus, His Son.” Stier. The rendering given here in the notes is the literal one, and the only one which gives the force of the original. But in an English version, it is absolutely necessary to invert the clauses and disturb the meaning) and living (as contrasted with the mere dead ceremony of entrance into the earthly holy place. This entrance is a real, living, and working entrance; the animated substance of what is imported, not the dead shadow. Most Commentators make living mean “life-giving,” producing, or leading to life. Others interpret it “everlasting:” so Chrysostom), through (in its primary, local meaning, ‘through,’ not in its derived instrumental one) the veil, that is, his flesh (on the veil, see note, ch. vi. 19. The flesh of Christ is here spoken of as the veil hung before the holiest place; that weak human mortal flesh was the state through which He had to pass before He could enter the holiest in heaven for us, and when He put off that flesh, the actual veil in the temple was rent from top to bottom, Matt. xxvii. 51); and (‘having’) a great Priest (i. e. a great High Priest; but here his Priesthood, not his High Priesthood, is more brought into prominence. He is a great Priest, because He is a Priest on his throne, a kingly Priest, and priestly King) over the house of God (the house of God here need not be more limited in meaning than in the similar passage ch. iii. 2. It is alleged that the expression here must mean the heaven. But Delitzsch well observes that the one meaning, the narrower, need not exclude the other, the wider. It is hardly probable, to begin with, that our Writer should in two places describe Christ as set over the house of God, in meanings entirely different from each other. Clearly, the heavenly sanctuary is regarded by him as also including the earthly, the church above as the home of the church below: see ch. xii. 22 ff.); <sup>22.]</sup> let us approach (draw near to God). So that the clauses which follow are best regarded as both belonging to this approach, since they also describe requisite preparations for worship: see this further treated below, on ver. 23) with a true heart (without hypocrisy, Chrysostom. So Hezekiah pleads, Isa. xxxviii. 3, "I have walked before thee in truth with a perfect (Septuagint, 'true') heart") in full assurance (ch. vi. 11: see note there) of faith (with no doubt as to the certainty of our access to God by the blood of Jesus), having our hearts sprinkled from (meaning, "sprinkled, and by that sprinkling cleansed from") an evil conscience (a conscience polluted with the guilt of sin: for "if a man's practice be bad, his conscience, in so far as it is the consciousness of that practice, is evil"), and having our body washed with pure water (both these clauses refer to the legal purifications of the Levitical priests, which took place by means of blood and water. At their first dedication, Aaron and his sons were sprinkled with blood, their bodies and their clothes, Exod. xxxi. 21; Lev. viii. 30. And so are we to be as God's priests, having access to Him, sprinkled with blood, not outwardly with that of the ram of consecration, but inwardly with that of the Lamb of God: the first could only produce purity of the flesh [ch. ix. 13], but the second, pureness of heart and conscience in God's sight. The washing with water also [Exod. xxix. 4] was to be part of the cleansing of Aaron and his sons: nor only so, but as often as they entered the holy place or approached the altar, they were to wash their hands and feet in the brazen laver, Exod. xxx. 20; xl. 30—32: and the High Priest, on the day of atonement, was to wash his whole body with water, Lev. xvi. 4. There can be no reasonable doubt that this clause refers directly to Christian baptism. The "font of the water" of Eph. v. 26, and the "font of regeneration," Tit. iii. 5, are analogous expressions; and the express mention of body here, as distinguished from "heart" before, stamps this interpretation with certainty. This distinction makes it impossible, with Calvin, and others, to spiritualize away the meaning into "the Spirit and doctrine of Christ,—the spiritual water with which Christ sprinkles his own: even His blood is not here excluded" [Schlichting]; for the word body confines the reference to an outward act. And so the majority of Commentators. Still in maintaining the externality of the words, as referring, and referring solely, to Baptism, we must remember, that Baptism itself is not a mere external rite, but at every mention of it carries the thought further, viz. to that spiritual washing of which it is itself symbolical and sacramental. Notice here that the word is body, and not "flesh," as ch. ix. 13: our whole natural life, and not the mere outside surface: that in which our soul dwells and works, the seat of the emotions and desires: this also must be purified in those who would approach God in Christ. So that I would understand with Delitzsch, that the sprinkling the heart from an evil conscience is, so to speak, intra-sacramental, a spiritual application of the purifying Blood, beyond sacramental rites, and the washing the body with pure water is purely sacramental, the effect of baptism taken in its whole blessed meaning and fulfilment as regards our natural existence. The end of his note is very beautiful: "As priests we are sprinkled, as priests we are bathed: sprinkled so that our hearts are freed from an evil conscience, and thus from self-condemnation, sprinkled with Christ's Blood, to be sprinkled with which and to be certain of and joyful in justification before God is one and the same thing,—washed in Holy Baptism, whose pure water penetrates with its saving power not only into the depths of our self-conscious life, but also into the very foundation of our corporeity, and thus sanctifies us not only in the flesh, but in the body and in the spirit: so bringing us, in our whole personal existence, through the Blood speaking in the Sanctuary, through the Water welling forth out of the Sanctuary, into so real a connexion, so close an union with the Sanctuary itself, that we are at all times privileged to enter into the Sanctuary, and to use, in faith, the new and living way").

We have here an extraordinary example of the persistence of a blunder through centuries. The word "faith," given here by the A. V., instead of hope—breaking up the beautiful triad of vv. 22, 23, 24,—faith, hope, love,—was a mere mistake, hope being the original, without any variety of reading, and hope being accordingly the rendering of all the English versions previously to 1611. And yet this is the version which some would have us regard as infallible, and receive as the written word of God!) so that it may be without wavering; for He is faithful that promised (viz. does this chain of exhortations of our Writer fall into a triple division, according to St. Paul's triad of the Christian life, 1 Cor. xiii. 13; 1 Thess. i. 3, v. 8; Col. i. 4 f.! Next to an exhortation to approach God in full assurance of faith, follows one to hold fast the confession of hope, and now comes one to emulate one another in love." Here, the question is, whether it is to be understood of the congregation of the faithful generally, the church,—as the word congregation has come from the act of assembling to signify the body thus assembled,—or of the single acts of assembling and gathering together of the various assemblies of Christians at various times. The latter is held by most Commentators, and seems far most appropriate here), as is the habit with some (this pretty plainly shows that not formal apostasies, but habits of negligence, are in the Writer's view. How far these might in time lead to the other, is a thought which no doubt lies in the background when he says, "let us consider one another," and "using exhortation;" and is more directly suggested by the awful cautions which follow); but using exhortation: and so much the more (this is better taken as belonging to the two preceding clauses only, to which it is attached, than as (belonging to the whole from ver. 23), as (in proportion as), 'the more' must be joined with ye see, not with "approaching," ('the nearer ye see') ye see (this ye see, in the second person, is unexpected in the midst of a sentence in the first person. It appeals at once to the watchfulness and discernment of the readers as regards the signs of the times. That Day, indeed, in its great final sense, is always near, always ready to break forth upon the church: but these Hebrews lived actually close upon one of those great types and foretastes of it, the destruction of the Holy City—the bloody and fiery dawn, as Delitzsch finely calls it, of the Great Day) the day (this shortest of all designations of the day of the Lord's coming, is found only in 1 Cor. iii. 13; 1 Thess. v. 4. "It is the Day of days, the ending-day of all days, the settling-day of all days, the Day of the promotion of Time into Eternity, the Day which for the Church breaks through and breaks off the night of this present world." Delitzsch) approaching.

26—31.] Caution, arising from the mention of that day,—which will be not a day of grace, but a day of judgment,—of the fearful peril of falling away from Christ. The passage finds a close parallel in ch. vi. 4 ff., and much of what was there said will apply here.

26.] For if we willingly sin (contrast to the "ignorant and erring," ch. v. 2. The sin meant is sufficiently defined by the connexion [for] with the preceding exhortations, and by the description of one who has so sinned in ver. 29. Neglect of assembling together, and loss of mutual exhortation and stimulus, would naturally result in [as it would be prompted by an inclination that way at first] the "departing from God" of ch. iii. 12; the "falling away" of ch. vi 6. It is the sin of apostasy from Christ back to the state which preceded the reception of Christ, viz. Judaism. This is the ground-sin of all other sins. The verb is in the present, not the past. "If we be found wilfully sinning," not "if we have wilfully sinned," at that Day. It is not of an act or of any number of acts of sin, that the Writer is speaking, which might be repented of and blotted out: but of a state of sin, in which a man is found when that day shall come) after the receiving (having received) the knowledge ("the word used for knowledge is one which of necessity means a thorough, heart-knowledge. And the Writer, by the use of this word, gives us to understand that he means by it not only a shallow historical notion about the Truth, but a living, believing knowledge of it, which has laid hold of a man and fused him into union with itself." Delitzsch. It is most important here to keep this cardinal point distinctly in mind: that these sinners willingly are not mere professors of religion, but real converts, or else ver. 29 becomes unintelligible) of the truth (the truth of God, as so often in St. Paul and St. John), there is no longer left remaining (see on ch. iv. 6) a sacrifice for sins (for there is but One true sacrifice for sins: if a man, having availed himself of that One, then deliberately casts it behind him, there is no second left for him. It will be observed that one thing is not, and need not be, specified in the text. That he has exhausted the virtue of the One Sacrifice, is not said: but in proportion to his willing rejection of it, has it ceased to operate for him. He has in fact, as Delitzsch observes, shut the door of repentance behind him, by the very fact of his being in an abiding state of willing sin. And this is still more forcibly brought out when, which Delitzsch does not notice, the scene of action is transferred to the great day of the Lord's coming, and he is found in that impenitent state irreparably. This verse has been misunderstood, 1) by the Fathers, who apply it to the Novatian controversy, and make it assert the impossibility of a second baptism: 2) by Theodore of Mopsuestia and others, who interpret it only of those in a state of impenitence, understanding that on penitence they will again come under the cleansing influence of the blood of Christ), but (there is left remaining: this is common to both clauses) a certain (some one, out of all that might befall various men and dispositions. The indefiniteness makes the declaration more awful) fearful (objective,—tremendous, not timid: fearful to think of, frightful) reception (i. e. meed, doom: not, as I believe universally interpreted without remark, expectation. The word used (ecdoché) appears never to have this sense, and this is the only place where it occurs in the New Test. All which remains is, the reception of the doom of judgment, and the fiery indignation, &c.) of judgment (i. e. by the context, unfavourable judgment), and fervour of fire (so literally. In an English version we cannot give it well, except by paraphrasing, as in the text: the stress is on fire, and fire is personified. It is the fire of God's presence, identified with Himself exactly as in ch. xii. 29: and it is the zeal, the fervour, the exaltedness of this consuming fire, which awaits the apostate from Christ), which shall (in using this future, the Writer transfers himself again to the present time: as if he had said, 'the fire which is destined to . . .') devour (and therefore finally and entirely) the adversaries.

28, 29 Argument from the less to the greater, to shew how grievous will be the punishment of the apostate from Christ. There is a very similar inference in ch. ii. 2, 3; xii. 25. Any one having set at nought the law of Moses (we must not take this as a general assertion, as true of whoever in any way broke the Mosaic law: but as an alleging of a well-known fact, that in certain cases a breaker of that law was subject to the penalty following. The form of the sentence might be changed thus, "If Moses' law could attach to violations of it the inexorable doom of death," &c. The reference is especially to Deut. xvii. 2—7, where the punishment of death is attached to the same sin as is here in question, viz.

apostasy: see ver. 3) dies (the normal present) without benefit of (apart from: not implying that no one felt compassion for him, but that such compassion, be it what it might, could not affect his doom) mercies (so literally: the merciful feelings of any who might be interested for him) before two or three witnesses (the allusion is to Deut. as above, where it is thus prescribed): of how much worse punishment, think ye (an appeal to the judgment of the readers themselves), shall he be found worthy (i. e. by God), who trampled under foot (the verb is in the past tense, as spoken at that day, and looking back upon this life. By "trampling under foot" is meant that flagrant contempt which those shew who deliberately abandon the Lord and His precepts. Stier remarks: Some of us remember the cry, "Ecrasez l'infame!") the Son of God (the higher title of the Mediator of the new covenant is used, to heighten the enormity of the crime), and accounted common the blood of the covenant (being the "precious blood" of Christ Himself, far above all blood of sprinkling under the old covenant. Even that [Lev. xvi. 19] had hallowing power: how much more this. But the apostate "accounted common" this blood—deemed it mere ordinary blood of a common man, and if so, consented to its shedding, for then Christ deserved to die as a blasphemer. And this, of that holy Blood, by which we have access to God! So that we have quite enough for the solemn sense, by rendering the word literally common, without going to the further meaning, unclean. Compare Acts x. 28, where the two are distinguished. The old Syriac version has "hath counted the blood of the covenant of him by whom he hath been sanctified as that of every man." The reader will recall our Lord's own expression, "the blood of the new testament (covenant)," Matt. xxvi. 28), in which (so literally: as sprinkled with which; as his element and condition of sanctification) he was sanctified (see Lev. xvi. 19 Septuagint, and our ch. xiii. 12 and ix. 13. He had advanced so far in the reality of the spiritual life, that this blood had been really applied to his heart by faith, and its hallowing and purifying effects were visible in his life: which makes the contrast the more terrible. And Delitzsch finely remarks, as against the assertors of mere shallow supralapsarianism, that without former experience of grace, without a life of faith far more than superficial, so irrecoverable a fall into the abyss is not possible. It is worthy of remark how Calvin evades the deep truth contained in the words wherewith he was sanctified:—"It is most unworthy to profane the blood of Christ, which is the material of our sanctification: and this those do who apostatize from the faith:" thus making he was sanctified into we are sanctified), and insulted the Spirit of grace (for the Spirit of grace, see Zech. xii. 10. No two things can be more opposed, as Delitzsch remarks, than insolence and grace. And this remark guides us to the answer to the question whether of grace here is a genitive objective or subjective: whether it is the spirit which belongs to grace, so that it is the gift of the divine grace [so most of the moderns], or grace which belongs to spirit, so that it is the gift of and the character of the spirit. The latter is much the more probable, both on account of the prophecy of Zechariah which is referred to, "I will pour out the spirit of grace and supplication," and on account of the verb insulted, which is most naturally referred to a Person as its object)? <sup>30, 31.</sup> And this reception of judgment and fervour of fire are certainties, testified to by God Himself. For we know Him who said, "To me belongeth vengeance, I will repay, saith the Lord" (the citation is from Deut. xxxii. 35, and is given not in agreement with the Hebrew text nor with the Septuagint ["in the day of vengeance will I recompense:" so also in the Samaritan Pentateuch, and in Philo], but, remarkably enough, in verbal accordance with St. Paul's citation of the same text, Rom. xii. 19, even to the adding of the words "saith the Lord," which are neither in the Hebrew nor the Septuagint. Two solutions of this are possible: 1) that the expression had become a common saying in the church: 2) that our Writer takes it from St. Paul's citation. A third alternative is of course open; that it is St. Paul himself, who quotes here as there. For a solution, see Introduction, on the authorship of this Epistle). And again, The Lord will judge His people (no doubt quoted primarily from the passage where it primarily occurs, in Deut. xxxii. 36. The judging there expresses another function of the judge from that which is adduced here. There, He will judge for rescue and for defence: here, for punishment and for condemnation. But the office of Judge, generally asserted, involves all that belongs to a judge: and if there it induces the comforting of those of whom He saw that their power is gone, and that there is here shut up or left, here the same general office of judgment also induces the punishment of the wilful sinner and apostate).

<sup>31.</sup> Axiomatic conclusion of these solemn warnings. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God (yet in 2 Sam. xxiv. 14, David says, "Let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, for His mercies are great; and let us not fall into the hand of man:" and in Eccles. ii. 18 we have "we will fall into the hands of the Lord, and not into the hands of men; for as His majesty is, so is His mercy." But the two sentiments are easily set at one. For the faithful, in their chastisement, it is a blessed thing to fall into God's Hands: for the unfaithful, in their doom, a dreadful one. On living, as recompence of reward.

36.] For (justification of the foregoing exhortation) of endurance (this in the original is placed first, carrying the main emphasis. "By degrees," says Bengel, "the Apostle from this verse to ver. 38 introduces the prophetic citation." In the Septuagint, in Hab. ii. 3, 4, the whole passage runs thus: "Though it tarry, wait for it: because it will surely come, it will not tarry. If any man draw back, my Lord hath no pleasure in him: but the just by my faith shall live") ye have need, that ye may do the will of God and receive the promise (this is the most correct rendering of the original: and thus it certainly ought to be taken here. No endurance or patience would be wanted, when they had done the will of God, to receive the promise: because such interval as should elapse between their having done the will of God in this sense, and receiving the promise, would be not here, but in the intermediate state. But that which they really do want endurance for, is that they may "prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God," and thus receive the promise: see ch. xiii. 21. The promise means, not the word of promise, but the substance of the promise, the promise in its fulfilment).

37, 38.] Encouragement to this endurance, by the fact of the time being short, and at the same time further proof of the necessity of it by God's renunciation of him that draws back: all from the same prophecy of Habakkuk. For yet a little little while (so literally. This expression is not in Habakkuk, but is found in Isa. xxvi. 20, to which the Writer probably alludes) He that is coming (the solemn prophetic title, 'He that is to come.' The Apostle paraphrases the prophetic words, and thus inserts Christ into the place of the vision in Habakkuk) shall come, and shall not tarry.

tinuation of the paraphrase: the two clauses of Hab. ii. 4 being transposed. In the original it runs as in A. V.: "Behold, his soul (which) is lifted up is not upright in him: but the just shall live by his faith:" or, an ambiguity extending to all three places where the saying is quoted, here, and reff. Rom., Gal., "The just by his faith, shall live." But the other is more probable. The transposition is apparently made on purpose. But my just man (there is much controversy about the word my, whether to insert it, and where to insert it. See in my Greek Test. Placed as in our text, my will point out, that man who is just before God, who belongs to God's people) shall live by faith: and if he (i. e. the just man, as Delitzsch very properly insists: not as in A. V., understood, "any man," but, in the true spirit of this whole cautionary passage, the very man himself who was justified, and partakes of the Christian life, by faith. The possibility of such a fall is, as he observes, among the principal things taught us by this Epistle) draw back, my soul ("whose soul? That of God, according to Scripture usage, as in this saying, My soul hateth your solemn feasts [Isa. i. 14],—or perhaps, that of Christ." Chrysostom. The former reference is doubtless right, not the latter, nor that given by Calvin, that "the Apostle is speaking in his own person") hath not pleasure in him. 39.] Here again he returns from that which is threatening in appearance to that which is encouraging and reassuring. But we (emphatic; bringing with it, in its mention, all that we are as Christians and that God has made us: you and I, partakers of the heavenly calling, ch. iii. 1) are not of backsliding (i. e., do not belong to the category of backsliding) unto (as its result: so Rom. vi. 19, unto iniquity, unto sanctification) destruction (everlasting perdition); but of CHAP. XI.—"We are of FAITH" concluded the last chapter. And now this great word comes before the mind of the Writer for its definition, its exemplification, its triumphs. By this, all the servants of God from the first have been upheld, and stimulated, and carried through their glorious course. By this exemplification the Writer evermore warmed and carried forward, breaks out at last into a strain of sublime eloquence, in which he gathers together in one the many noble deeds of faith which time and space would not allow of his specifying severally.

1.] Now Faith is (notice that it is of faith in general, all faith, not here of faith in God in particular, that the Writer is speaking) confidence (there has been much difference concerning the meaning of this word [hypostasis]). The ancients for the most part understand it here as substance, the real and true essence: faith gives reality to things not yet seen, so that they are treated as veritably present. Others have rendered it foundation. On the other hand the majority of modern Commentators have preferred the meaning which the word bears in ch. iii. 14, where see note: viz. "confidence." And there can be no reasonable doubt, that this is the true rendering here. Thus only do the two descriptions given correspond in nature and quality. The one being subjective in both these cases of parallel, it is but reasonable that the other should be also) of things hoped for, demonstration (conviction, or proof). The modern Commentators are divided: some have taken the subjective sense of conviction,—inward persuasion of the truth of. But this sense of the word is hardly borne out by usage. And therefore we seem driven back on the objective meaning as referred to things, viz. proof, or demonstration. As far as the sense is concerned, both come to the same in the end. It is faith, an act of the mind, which is this demonstration: it is therefore necessarily subjective in its effect,—is the demonstration to him who believes) of matters not seen (this is a much wider designation than things hoped for, embracing the whole realm of the spiritual and invisible, even to the being and essence of God Himself: see below, ver. 6: and compare Rom. viii. 24, where St. Paul's expressions differ slightly in form from these. There is no ground whatever for saying that our Writer makes faith identical with hope. Faith is the confidence of things hoped for: Hope exists independently of it, but derives its reality, and is ripened into confidence, by its means. And faith is the demonstration to us of that which we do not see: compare the beautiful words of Calvin: "Eternal life is promised to us, but after death: we are told of a blessed resurrection, but we meantime become the prey of decay: we are pronounced righteous, and yet sin dwells in us: we hear ourselves called blessed, and meantime are overwhelmed with infinite miseries: we are promised affluence of all good things, but are all our days in hunger and thirst: God proclaims that He will be ever present to help us, but seems deaf to our cries. What would become of us if we leant not on hope, and unless our mind, guided by the Word and Spirit of God, emerged through the midst of the shades, above this present world?").

2.] For ("and so high a description of faith is not undeserved, seeing that . . .") The for does not bring in any proof of the foregoing description, only shews that faith is noble enough to be dignified with the offices just named) in (not, by, merely: but elemental; in the domain, or region, or matter of) this (in this it was, that . . .) the elders (i. e. not merely those who lived before us, but those ancients whom we dignify with the name of elders. "the fathers," see Rom. ix. 5; Heb. i. 1) were testified of (it is of course implied, that the testimony was a good one).

3.] The Writer now begins his series of examples of the power of faith. But instead of opening them with the example of our first parents, which he probably passes over as not sufficiently recorded in Scripture, he adduces the great and primary postulate of faith, which has regard to a fact contemporaneous indeed with them, and holding this first chronological place in the series: viz. the creation of the world itself. By faith (faith is the instrumental cause, and the expression is nearly equivalent to through faith, with which indeed it is interchanged in ver. 33) we perceive (we have intellectual perception. The world itself, and the things therein, are seen by us: but the fact of its creation by God is apprehended, with our rational or spiritual faculties) the ages (see note on ch. i. 2, where I have maintained that this expression includes in it all that exists under the conditions of time and space, together with those conditions of time and space themselves, conditions which do not bind God, and did not exist independently of Him, but are themselves the work of His word) to have been framed (so A. V.: and we cannot perhaps do better. It is rather however, furnished forth, "made to be, and to be what we find them") by the word of God (the spoken word, the command, as throughout Gen. i.:—the term in the Greek is not logos. Nor must it here be taken for the personal word: ch. i. 2, is on a different matter), so that not out of things apparent hath that which is seen (i.e. the visible world) been made (in all that we see with our sense, of recreation and reproduction, that which is seen is made out of that which appears. The seed becomes the plant: the grub, the moth. But that which is above sight, viz., faith, leads us to apprehend, that this has not been so in the first instance: that the visible world has not been made out of apparent materials).

4.] By faith (see above) Abel offered to God a more excellent sacrifice (literally, more sacrifice) than Cain (than Cain did. But how a more excellent sacrifice? First, there can be no doubt that the adjective must be taken not of quantity, but of quality: it was not a more abundant, but a more excellent. But how was it so? Our text answers us: because of, by, faith. The more excellence must be looked for then rather in the disposition with which the sacrifice was offered, than in the nature of the sacrifice itself. Gregory the Great [cited by Delitzsch] says well, "All that is given to God, is weighed according to the disposition of its giver: whence it is written, 'God had regard to Abel, and to his gifts, but had no regard to Cain and his gifts.' The Scripture does not say, 'He regarded the gifts of Abel, and did not regard the gifts of Cain,' but first says, that 'He regarded Abel,' and then adds, 'and his gifts.' So we see that it was not the gifts which made Abel to be acceptable, but Abel who made the gifts to be so." This beyond doubt is the principal ground of the designation more excellent. With regard to the sacrifices themselves; with our present knowledge of type and sacrifice, many reasons might be alleged why that of Abel should be more according to God's will than that of Cain; but none of those reasons can be safely or decisively applied here. That Abel's consisted of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof—the first and the best, whereas Cain's was merely an offering of the fruit of the ground, perfunctory and common-place, may be a circumstance not without weight in appreciating the term by faith. That Abel's was an offering of slain animals, God's own appointed way, so soon after, of the sinner's approach to Him, whereas Cain's was only a gift, as if he could approach God without shedding of blood,—this may also be an important element in the term by faith. But it would not be safe here to insist on either of these), by means of which (viz. which faith, not, which sacrifice: by which must apply to the same as by it below, and that surely can refer to nothing but the faith, which is the great leading idea of the chapter) he was testified (see above, ver. 2) to be righteous (when? by whom? not, by our Saviour, nor by St. John [1 John iii. 12], though in both places such testimony is borne to him: but as explained in the next clause, at the time of his sacrifice, and by God Himself), God bearing testimony upon (in regard to) his gifts (of what kind this testimony was, there can be little doubt. Theodotus's rendering of the text in Genesis, "and God consumed them by fire," though wrong as a rendering, is probably right in fact. Compare Exod. xiv. 24; 1 Kings xviii. 24, 28): and by means of it (his faith, again, not, his sacrifice: see above) having died he yet speaketh (viz., as interpreted by the parallel place, ch. xii. 24, where it is said of the "blood of sprinkling," that it speaketh better things than Abel,—by means of his blood, of which it is said by God in Gen. iv. 10, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth to me from the ground." Some have taken it in the sense of 'speaks to us to follow his example.' And perhaps Stuart may be partly right, who recognizing the allusion to Gen. iv. 10, says, "The form of expression only in our verse seems to be borrowed from Gen. iv. 10, for here it is the faith of Abel which makes him speak after his death; viz. to those who should come after him, exhorting and encouraging them to follow his example." I say partly right, for however this may be in the background the cry of his blood is ob-

5, 6.] The example of Enoch: and axiomatic declaration upon it. By faith ("how was he translated by faith? Because his well-pleasing to God was the ground of his translation, and faith was the ground of this well-pleasing." Chrysostom) Enoch was translated not to see death (see the Septuagint version of Gen. v. 24, after which this verse is framed: "And Enoch pleased God, and was not found, because God translated him." was translated, by a sudden disappearance from this earth. This translation was hardly, as Calvin thinks, "some extraordinary death," though he means this in no rationalistic sense, as is plain from his accompanying remarks:—but rather a change which passed upon him altogether without death, from corruptibility to incorruptibility, from the natural body to the spiritual); and was not found (see above), because God translated him: for before his translation a testimony is given to him (the expression implies the continued existence of the testimony in the text of Scripture), that he hath (had) pleased God. But apart from faith it is impossible (it is a general axiom, not a mere assertion regarding Enoch; it it were, we should expect it was impossible for him) to please (Him, as is evident) at all (to do a single act well pleasing to God): for it behoves him that cometh to God (that approach which is elsewhere designated by drawing near to God, ch. vii. 19,—for the purposes of worship or of communion, or of trust, or service generally) to believe (literally, to have believed, because it is not here the state in which the comer is at his coming, but the state which has originated his coming, of which that coming is the fruit, which is insisted on) that He is (exists: his faith being to him thus a demonstration of a thing not seen), and becomes (is eventually) a renderer of reward (ch. ii. 2) to them that seek Him out (thus his faith is also to him the confidence of things hoped for: God's existence is realized to him by it, and by it his future reward assured).

his faith, rather than by the results of that faith, that he condemned the world, and became, &c.) he condemned (the sense may be either imperfect, he condemned, while building the ark, the unbelieving world around,—or, past, he once for all condemned the unbelieving then, and in them, the world, which lies in unbelief. Better perhaps the latter. On the sense, Limborch says, "He is said to condemn another who by his deed shews what another ought to have done, and, because he did not do it, convicts him of a fault, and shews his liability to punishment") the world (so also in Matt. xii. 41, 42), and became heir of the righteousness which is according to faith (Noah is the first in Scripture who is called "righteous" or "just," Gen. vi. 9. See Ezek. xiv. 14, 20, where he is named together with Daniel and Job as an example of righteousness: and Wisd. x. 4, 6; Ecclus. xlv. 17; 2 Pet. ii. 5; where he is called a preacher of righteousness. And this righteousness, which is matter of history in the Old Test., our Writer refers to his faith as its measure. So Calvin: "Moses relates that he was righteous: that the cause and root of this righteousness was faith, is not told in the history, but is proved by the Apostle from the facts." This righteousness according to faith seems to be altogether in St. Paul's sense, the righteousness which is by faith, Rom. iv. 13, though the expression itself is foreign to St. Paul. The idea of its being matter of inheritance is also according to St. Paul. It should be noticed that the whole expression is used, in an Epistle in which righteousness by faith forms no part of the main subject, as one familiar and well known to the readers).

8.] ABRAHAM'S example. By faith Abraham, being called (viz. by God, Gen. xii. 1 ff. Another reading, having considerable authority, is, "he that was called, named, Abraham." And the sense thus would be very good,—whatever Bleek and Delitzsch have said against it,—when we take into account the meaning of the name Abraham, a father of nations. That this change of name did not take place till twenty-five years after his removal from Haran, is no objection, but is just what would be the point raised: "By faith, he who was [afterwards] called Abraham, father of nations, &c." But on the whole, I adhere to the received text), obeyed, to go out (the infinitive explains wherein he obeyed) to a (or, 'the' place which he was hereafter to receive for an inheritance (not that he was conscious even of this promise when he went out, for it was made to him afterwards in Canaan, see Gen. xii. 7); and went out, not knowing whither he was going (coming).

9, 10.] By faith he sojourned in the land of the promise (concerning which the promise, Gen. xii. 7, had been given), as a stranger's (as if it did not belong to him, but to another: see Acts vii. 6, which is strictly parallel, and Gen. xv. 13), dwelling in tents (see Gen. xii. 8; xiii. 3; xviii. 1 ff.) with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise (what is implied is, not so much that the promise was renewed to them, as that all three waited for the performance of the same promise, and in this waiting, built themselves no permanent abode)

10.] for (reason of his sojourning in the land of promise as in a strange land) he waited for the city which has the foundations (beyond doubt, the heavenly city, the "Jerusalem which is above," thus contrasted with the frail and moveable tents in which the patriarchs dwelt. No other interpretation will suit the language here used. The "city of the living God" of ch. xii. 32, and the "city which is to come" of ch. xiii. 14, must be here meant also. Of the earthly Jerusalem indeed it is said, Ps. lxxxvii. 1, "its foundation is in the holy mountains:" but it is impossible, that the earthly Jerusalem can be meant here. The lives of the dwellers in her rather corresponded to the precarious dwelling in tents than to the abiding in a permanent city: and the true reference of the expression "having the foundations" is to be found in Rev. xxi. 14, 19. As having these foundations, it forms a contrast to the tent, placed on the ground and easily transported. Ebrard objects to this view, that it is unhistoric to say that the patriarchs looked for the heavenly city: but Delitzsch well answers, that it is not the mere historic question, what they knew and expected, with which our Writer is concerned, but the question what it was that their faith, breaking through this knowledge in its yearnings for the future, framed to itself as matter of hope. The expectation of the literal fulfilment of a promise is one thing: the hopes and prospects and surmises built upon the character of that promise, another. The one is mere belief: the other is faith), of which the architect and master-builder is God (very similarly) merely according to and consistent with it) faith died these all (there is no need to say with some of the ancient commentators, "except Enoch:" the promises began with Abraham, and it is evident from the end of our verse, and from ver. 15, that the reference is solely to the patriarchs), not having received (in their fulfilment, that is) the promises (plural, because the promise was again and again repeated to the patriarchs, see the citations from Gen. above, and add Gen. xvii. 5-8, xxvi. 3, 4, xxviii. 13, 14), but having seen them from afar, and greeted them ("from afar they saw the promises in the reality of their fulfilment, from afar they greeted them as the wanderer greets his longed-for home even when he only comes in sight of it at a distance, drawing to himself as it were magnetically and embracing with inward love that which is yet afar off. But now (as the case now is: the logical "now:" see 1 Cor. xiii. 13 note, and our ch. viii. 6) they desire a better (home), that is, a heavenly one (the justification of this assertion, which seems to ascribe New Test. ideas to the Old Test. fathers, must be found in such sayings as that of the dying Jacob, Gen. xlix. 18, which only represent a wide class of their faithful thoughts): wherefore God is not ashamed of them to be called their God (from the present tense, is not ashamed, and especially from the clause which follows, it is probable, as Bleek has well remarked, that the Writer intends not merely to adduce that God did once call Himself their God, but that he is now not ashamed to be so called, they enduring and abiding with Him where He is: in the same sense in which our Lord adduces the same circumstance, Matt. xxii. 31 ff. See below): for He prepared for them a city (permanent and eternal, in contrast to the tents in which they wandered. There are two ways of understanding this clause: 1) to take the verb as a pluperfect, "for God had prepared for them a city:" 2) God is not ashamed of them, nor to be called their God: and we find proof of this not only in His thus naming Himself, but in His preparing for them a city: the home for which they yearned: He did not deceive their hopes, but acted as their God by verifying those hopes. Thus, and thus only, does the preparing keep its proper emphasis, and the past tense its proper time: they looked for a city: and God refused not to be called their God, for He prepared for them that city, verified those their hopes. And if we ask for the interpretation of this preparing, I answer, in the preparation of the way of Christ, and bringing in salvation by Him, of which salvation they in their anticipation of faith were partakers John viii. 56).

<sup>17—31.]</sup> Having spoken thus generally of the faith of the patriarchs, he returns to individual instances, and begins again with Abraham, recounting the severest test to which his faith was put. Chrysostom remarks, that he here proceeds to a far greater triumph of faith, in a matter in which God seemed to contradict Himself, and faith contended with faith, and command with promise. Compare Ecclus. xlv. 20; Wisd. x. 5; 1 Macc. ii. 52; James ii. 21. By faith Abraham hath offered (perfect tense, as if the work and its praise were yet enduring) Isaac when tempted: and (the and rises into climax: not only Abraham offered Isaac, but &c.) he that had accepted the promises (more than "had the promises," ch. vii. 6; he had as it were with open arms accepted and taken to himself each and all of the promises, the possession of Canaan, the multiplication of his seed, the blessing of all nations in his seed) was offering (now the Writer transforms the time into the purely temporal and strict one—he was in the act of offering—the work was begun) his only begotten, he to whom (this refers, not to Isaac, as many Commentators and our A. V. "of whom it was said," but to Abraham, the immediate antecedent in the text, and the immediately resumed subject, after the relative clause, "accounting," &c.) it was spoken (by God), In Isaac shall thy seed be called (in Isaac, through and in descent from him, shall thy seed be called thy seed: only Isaac's descendants shall be known as Abraham's seed): 19.] (reason of this paradoxical conduct: because Abraham's faith was able, in anticipation, to clear the suspicion of God's faithfulness by the suggestion of His power. He could and would make a way to the keeping of His own promise) reckoning that God is (not, was, see below) able to raise (no supply of 'him' is admissible, as mistakenly inserted by many Commentators, and even by the A. V. It was not God's power to raise Isaac, but God's power, generally, to raise from the dead, that Abraham believed) even from [among] the dead; from whence (i. e. from the dead) he also (besides the conviction in his mind) received him back in a parable (figuratively.—I have discussed at length in my Greek Test. the various interpretations, and seen cause to adhere to this, the ordinary one. We may with reason ask, What was the figure or parable? if it is meant merely, that though not actually, yet in some sense, Abraham received Isaac from the dead, would not "so to speak," or a similar phrase, be the more obvious way of expressing this? The true identification of the parable is I am persuaded to be found in the figure under which Isaac was sacrificed, viz. the ram, as already hinted by Chrysostom. Abraham virtually sacrificed his son: God designated Isaac for the burnt-offering, but provided a ram in his stead. Under the figure of that ram, Isaac was slain, being received back by his father in his proper person, risen from that death which he had undergone in a figure or parable, in, under the figure of the ram).

20.] By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau even concerning things future (or, concerning things future also,—blessed them concerning not only things present, but things future. Jacob is named before Esau, as the worthier and more important in the theocratic sense; perhaps also as having gained the greater portion of the blessing). 21.] By faith Jacob, when dying, blessed each of the sons of Joseph (the faith consisted in transposing his hands wittingly, laying the right hand on the head of the younger, Ephraim, who was to become the greater tribe); and he worshipped (this incident is not connected with the other, but took place before it, on another occasion, when Jacob made Joseph swear to him that he would bury him with his fathers, and not in Egypt, Gen. xlvii. 31. Perhaps the Writer inverts the order of the two, to bring the two acts of blessing, that of Isaac and that of Jacob, together. This act of worship was one of faith, inasmuch as it was connected with a command, the point of which was, God's promise respecting the land of Canaan. And the faith was shewn by the turning of his aged and dying body in a posture of thankful adoration) on the top of his staff (an incalculable quantity of idolatrous nonsense has been written on these words by Roman-Catholic Commentators, taking as their starting-point the rendering of the Vulgate, "and adored the top of his staff," and thence deriving an argument for the worship of images, assuming that there was an image or symbol of power upon Joseph's staff, to which they apply the words. But first, it must be Jacob's, not Joseph's staff, which is intended, as remarked by Augustine. In his comment on the place, he has nothing of adoring the staff or the top of the staff. What Jerome thought of such an idea, is plainly seen: for he derides it, and treats it simply as a mistranslation of the Hebrew, which he explains as it stands in our A. V. Chrysostom has the idea, but not a word of the image: thinks that Jacob worshipped the power, symbolized by Joseph. I will only cite the inference from the above ancient data in Cornelius-a-Lapide, as most instructive regarding the grounds on which age after age the chief abominations of the church of Rome have been introduced: "Rightly therefore do the Fathers of the second Nicene Council prove, from this adoration of Joseph's staff, the adoration and culture of images, and teach that it does not stop with the image, but is referred and passed on to its prototype." The real question with regard to the passage is confined within very narrow limits. The same Hebrew word signifies a staff, or a bed, according as it is pointed. And, as there are no points in the ancient Hebrew texts, it is an open question, which meaning we are to take. The Septuagint have taken "staff," though, as Jerome notices, they have rendered the same word "bed" in Gen. xlviii. 2, two verses after. Our A. V. has taken this latter: "And Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head." And so almost all the moderns agree in taking it. Stuart, it is true, has argued at some length for the meaning "staff," on the ground that the eastern beds have no head properly so called, being merely a carpet or rug spread on the ground. But he has in his mind in thus objecting, a bedstead, not a bed. The head of a bed, be it where or what it may, is that part of it where the person's head lies: and Delitzsch has made it probable, that Jacob turned himself in his bed so as to lay his face to the pillow: compare Isa. xxxviii. 2. If the 'staff' is to be taken, then it must be his own, not Joseph's staff, which is indicated, and the gesture might have had a meaning correspondent to the thought in Gen. xxxii. 10, "with my staff I passed this Jordan," viz. the recognition of that God who had supported him through life, and declaration of his having done with all human supports. It is due to the better Roman-Catholic Commentators, such as Estius and Justiniani, to say, that no such inference as that cited above is to be found in them.

Some have expressed surprise that no mention is made of the far more important blessings of the twelve sons of Jacob in Gen. xlix. But Delitzsch says well, "He plucks, so to speak, only the flowers which stand by his way, and leaves the whole meadow-ful to his readers").

<sup>22.</sup> By faith Joseph, when dying, made mention of the exodus (by this time technically so known, from the title of the second book of Moses) of the sons of Israel; and commanded concerning his bones (even Joseph, who had attained such eminence and power in Egypt, did not account it his country, but in faith spoke of the promise of God as certain, Gen. I. 24, and realized it so as to enjoin the removal of his own remains when it should come to pass).

<sup>23.</sup> Now the Writer passes on to Exodus, and its chief example, Moses, who even in his preservation by his parents was the child of faith. By faith Moses, when born, was hidden three months by his parents, because they saw the child was comely; and they feared not the command of the king (to destroy all the male children, Exod. i. 22. Their faith was, loving trust in God who had given them so fair a child, which led them to perform, as far as in them lay, the duties of parents to it, and not the cruel part which the tyrant prescribed).

24—28.] The faith of Moses when come to man's estate. By faith Moses, when grown up (literally, become great. The expression is from the Greek of the passage in Exodus), refused to be called son of a (or, the) daughter of Pharaoh (there is no record in the Old Test. of this refusal of Moses: but the fact of the adoption was matter of Jewish traditionary belief: and the refusal is fairly gathered from his whole conduct); choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to possess a temporary enjoyment of sin; esteeming (this comes in with a slightly ratiocinative force—"esteeming, as he did") the reproach of Christ (what is this? Certainly not, with some, merely reproach similar to that of Christ: nor again does the more usual explanation, reproach on account of Christ, satisfy the meaning; nor even the modification of it which makes Moses thus choose, from a principle of faith in the Messiah to come. Far better is Bleek, "reproach which Christ had to bear in his own person, and has to bear in his members." And in this view, we may say, that all Israel's reproach was Christ's reproach: Israel typified Christ: all Israel's sufferings as the people of God were Christ's sufferings, not only by anticipation in type, but by that inclusion in Christ which they, His members before the Head was revealed, possessed in common with us. Christ was ever present in and among God's people: and thus De Wette well and finely says here, "The Writer calls the reproach which Moses suffered, the reproach of Christ, as Paul, 2 Cor. i. 5; Col. i. 24, calls the sufferings of Christians the sufferings of Christ, i. e. of Christ dwelling, striving, suffering, in his Church as in His body; to which this reproach is referred according to the idea of the unity of the Old and New Testaments, and of the eternal Christ [the Logos] already living and reigning in the former") greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he looked (the verb means, "so to look at any thing, as to be by waiting for it, or generally by the regard of it, determined or strengthened in a course of action") to the recompence of reward (viz. the great eternal reward spoken of vv. 39 f.: not the possession of Canaan merely).

27.] By faith he left Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king (when? This is much disputed. Was it when he fled after the murder of the Egyptian? or when he left Egypt with the children of Israel? Against the latter, it seems a decisive objection, that the Exodus was made, not in defiance of the king of Egypt, but with his consent, and at his urgent instance. It is also a lesser objection to it, that thus the chronological order is broken, the next particular, the institution of the Passover, having taken place previously to the Exodus. A third objection is, and one not easily got over, that the singular, he left Egypt, cannot well be referred to an event in Israel's history, but must refer to the personal history of Moses. Otherwise we should expect "he crossed," and not "they crossed," below in ver. 29. Regard being had to these objections, I cannot but think that to understand this of the Exodus is altogether impossible. It must then refer to the former flight. And this is the view of all the ancient expositors: and of many among the moderns. But we are here met by a startling difficulty. In Exod. ii. 14, we read that on finding that his slaying of the Egyptian was known, "Moses was afraid:" here we read, "not fearing the wrath of the king."

Were it not for this difficulty, we may safely say that the other interpretation would never have been thought of; but standing as it does, it is no wonder that it has driven Commentators to another resource. Still, if owing to other circumstances in the text it is, as we have seen it to be, necessary to refer it to that first leaving of Egypt, we have no right to set those aside on account of this difficulty: rather should we say that there must be some solution of it, however difficult to find. In attempting to give a solution, I may confess that I see as yet no satisfactory one. It may be that the truth is, that though the fact of his flight was the effect of his fear, the same flight itself, the dereliction of Egypt and reserving himself for further action, shewed that that fear did not possess nor bear him away. But on any solution, the difficulty remains. Had it stood "fearing," instead of not fearing, the whole would have been plain enough: "when he feared the anger of the king"): for he endured, as seeing the invisible One (or, "the King who is invisible:" compare 1 Tim. i. 17). <sup>28.]</sup> By faith he hath celebrated (the perfect is used, on account of the Passover being a still enduring feast) the Passover (not as some interpret, in faith of the Redeemer to come, which point does not enter into consideration here: but by that faith which was to him the evidence of things unseen, viz. of the promise that the Destroyer should pass over and not hurt them), and the effusion of the blood (viz. of the blood of the paschal lamb on the lintel and door-posts. This word is ordinarily used of those cases where the blood was sprinkled round the altar, e.g. Lev. i. 5; vi. 32, &c. So that the word applies well to this ordinance, where the blood was sprinkled by means of a bunch of hyssop), that he who destroyed the firstborn might not touch them.

<sup>29.]</sup> By faith they (see above) crossed the Red sea as through dry land: of which the Egyptians making experiment were swallowed up.

<sup>31.]</sup> The last example is one connected with the taking of Jericho, just mentioned. By faith (shewn in her confession, Josh. ii. 9, "I know that Jehovah hath given you the land:" and ver. 11, "Jehovah your God, He is God in heaven above and in earth beneath") Rahab the harlot (not to be softened into an inn-keeper, as some have done. See note, Matt. i. 5) did not perish with them who were disobedient (the inhabitants of Jericho were disobedient to the will of God manifested by the signs and wonders which he had wrought for Israel: as is implied by Rahab's speech, Josh. ii. 9—12), having received (viz. to her house: they lodged there, Josh. ii. 1) the spies (sent by Joshua to Jericho, Josh. ii. 1) with peace (so that they had nothing hostile to fear from her). 32—40.] The Writer breaks off, feeling that such an illustration of faith by examples would be endless, and gathers up those many which remain in one.

32.] And what say I yet (more, any) further? for the time (which might be reasonable for writing an epistle) will fail me narrating (if I narrate) concerning Gideon (see Judges vi.—viii.), and Barak (Judges iv. v. Barak was not so strong in faith as he might have been, though he did believe and go to the fight, and triumph: see Judg. iv. 8, 9), and Samson (Judges xiii—xvi.), and Jephthah (Judges xi. 1—xii. 7); and David, and Samuel, and of the prophets; who (does not strictly identify the antecedents: for many of the actions which follow were done by others than those previously mentioned) through faith (through faith, instead of “by faith,” for the first time in the chapter, suits perhaps better the miscellaneous verbs of predication which follow, e.g. quenched the violence of fire) subdued kingdoms (the acts referred to may be Gideon's victory over the Midianites [Judges vii.], Barak's over the Canaanites [ib. iv.], Samson's over the Philistines [ib. xiv. ff.], Jephthah's over the Ammonites [ib. ix.], David's over the Philistines [2 Sam. v. 17—25; viii. 1; xxi. 15 ff.], Moabites, Syrians, Edomites [ib. viii. 2 ff.], Ammonites [ib. x. xii. 26 ff.], wrought righteousness (so Samuel, the righteous judge, 1 Sam. xii. 3, 4; David, the righteous king, 2 Sam. viii. 15; 1 Chron. xviii. 14: and indeed in a wide sense all of them, see Jer. xxiii. 5; Ezek. xlv. 9), obtained promises (the words are capable of two senses: 1) got from God spoken promises, as e.g. the prophets: or 2) obtained the fulfilment of promises. 1) is taken by Chrysostom [referring it to the promise to David that his seed should sit on his throne], and others. But it seems to me altogether improbable that the Writer should thus illustrate faith by a fact which, though it may have accompanied faith in the recipient, was certainly no fruit or direct triumph of it: and that in the face of such sayings as Josh. xxi. 45; 1 Kings viii. 56, and of Gideon's trials of God. The objection which is brought against 2), that it is inconsistent with “not having received the promises,” ver. 13, and with “received not the promise,” ver. 39, is very simply answered: it is not said that they obtained the promises, or the promise, but anathematically: they obtained promises, but not the promises which were yet future. And so most Commentators), stopped the mouths of lions (referring principally, it may be, to Daniel, of whom it is said, Dan. vi. 22, that God sent his angel and stopped the mouths of the lions: where notice also the addition “because he believed in his God.” But reference may be also to Samson, Judges xiv. 6, and David, 1 Sam. xvii. 34: and I may add, Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, 2 Sam. xliii.

Theophylact says, “He does not say, extinguished fire, but the power of fire, which is even greater: though it remained kindled, yet it had no power against them to burn them.” It is said of them, 1 Mace. ii. 59, that they “by believing were saved out of the flame.” Delitzsch reminds us that one of the two martyrs at Brussels, Henry Voes and Joh. Esche, when the flames of the faggots rose round him, said, that it felt to him as if they were strewing roses under him), escaped the edge (literally, mouths, or edges, plural, because the Writer has various examples in mind) of the sword (e. g. David from Saul, 1 Sam. xviii. 11; xix. 10, 12; xxi. 10: Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 1 ff.: Elisha, 2 Kings vi. 14 ff., 31 ff.: Jeremiah, Baruch, Jer. xxxvi. 26: Ebedmelech, Jer. xxxviii. 8 ff., compared with xxxix. 18), were made strong out of weakness (so Samson, after his hair grew, Judges xvi. 28 ff.: David, who ends so many of his plaintive psalms with jubilant thanksgiving: Hezekiah, who after deadly sickness was restored to fifteen years of health, 2 Kings xx.; Isa. xxxviii. The ancient expositors refer the words, not so probably, to the strengthening of Israel after the return from the captivity), were made strong in war (Theodoret says, “Both those mentioned before, and the sons of Mattathias, Judas, and Jonathan, and Simon.” It is not improbable that these later glories of the faith were also before the Writer’s mind: they unquestionably are in the next verse), put to flight armies of aliens (the word is common in the Septuagint, of Gentiles, aliens from God’s people. The reference of the fact may be general, to many who have preceded: but I should rather regard it as describing the Maccabæan victories. Delitzsch would understand all from “escaped the edge of the sword” of those times; the escape of Mattathias and his sons into the mountains, the increase and success of the little band that strengthened itself in God, the first victories of Judas Maccabæus over Apollonius, Seron, and others, the formal and victorious war of the Asmonæan heroes with the Syrians and neighbouring people. “That the Writer,” he continues, “should recognize these as illustrious deeds of faith, is no wonder. In our times indeed it is the custom to represent the mighty revival of the Maccabæan period rather as human than divine, rather as patriotic and popular than theocratic and national: but the book of Daniel shews us, in prophetic delineation of that time, the holy people of the Most High, conflicting with the atheistic and antichristian prince of this world, and ascribes to this conflict the highest imaginable importance in reference to the sacred history. Therefore I hold that these clauses pass beyond ‘the prophets,’ and over the book of Daniel to the first of Maccabees, which in the Septuagint is attached to it: which indeed is generally acknowledged with regard to the two last clauses, and is the more certain because the unusual word here used for armies, as well as that for aliens, are of frequent occurrence in the first book of Maccabees.” And perhaps, after all, this may be the true view).

<sup>35.</sup>] Women received their dead by (out of, by means of, their reception springing out of it as its cause) resurrection (not, the resurrection: see below. The cases alluded to seem to be those of the widow of Zarephath, 1 Kings xvii. 17 ff., and the Shunamite, 2 Kings iv. 17 ff., whose sons were raised, the former by Elijah, the latter by Elisha. The faith must be that of the women themselves, the subject of the sentence, not merely that in the prophets): but (for the contrast, see below) others were broken on the wheel (the case especially referred to is that of Eleazar, 2 Mace. vi. 18—end; and the tympaanum here mentioned seems to have been an instrument like a wheel or drum-head, on which the victim was stretched and scourged to death. And in the deaths of the seven brothers, which are related differently from the account in 2 Macc. vii., we read of the first [1 Macc. ix. 12], "they put him upon the wheel," and similarly of several of the others), not accepting the deliverance (offered to them: see in the deaths of the seven brethren, 2 Macc. vii. Eleazar himself says, 2 Macc. vi. 30, "Whereas I might have been delivered from death, I now endure sore pain, &c."), that they might obtain a better resurrection (there can, I think, be little doubt that Chrysostom's explanation of better is right,—better, i.e. not such as the dead of the women before mentioned. Those sons were raised by a kind of resurrection to a life which should again end in death: but these expected a glorious resurrection to endless life. See 2 Macc. vii. 9, "The King of the world shall raise us up, who have died for this law, unto everlasting life:" also ib. vv. 11, 14, 20, 23, 36. Hence we may perhaps understand the others again, distinguishing these even higher triumphs of faith from these former): others again had trial of cruel mockings (so the A. V. well: for the word must mean insult accompanied with cruelty, judging from its use in the place here referred to, viz. 2 Macc. vii. 7, 10. See also 1 Macc. ix. 26) and of scourgings (see 2 Macc. as before), yea, moreover of bonds and prison (so Jonathan, 1 Macc. xiii. 12. But perhaps he now speaks more generally, e.g. of Hanani, 2 Chron. xvi. 10, Micaiah, the son of Imlah, 1 Kings xxii. 26, and Jeremiah, Jer. xxxii. 2, 3, &c.): they were stoned (so Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20—22, referred to by our Lord, Luke xi. 51, Matt. xxiii. 35. There was a tradition, reported by Tertullian and other fathers, that Jeremiah was stoned at Daphne in Egypt, by the people: and perhaps the Writer refers to this also. It cannot refer still to the Maccabean times, seeing that stoning was not a Greek but purely Jewish punishment. Some imagine it to refer to Naboth, 1 Kings xxi.: but this is hardly probable), they were sawn asunder (the traditional death of Isaiah at the hands of king Manasseh. There seems no reason to doubt, that this tradition was known in the apostolic times: Jerome calls it a "most certain tradition among the Jews," and mentions the general reference of these words to it by Christians. The punishment was used sometimes in the case of captives in war: see 2 Sam. xii. 31, 1 Chron. xx. 3), were tempted (certainly it is surprising, to meet with so mild a word in the midst of torments and ways of dreadful death. Our surprise is not much mitigated by the sense given, e.g. by Stuart, "temptations presented by persecutors to the victims of their torture, in order to induce them to forsake their religion, and worship the gods of the idolaters." And this surprise having been all but universally felt, various have been the conjectures resorted to. Some have been for leaving out the word altogether. And other proposals have been made, consisting of the substitution of other Greek words somewhat like this one, and bearing the sense of were burned, or were mutilated, &c. As it stands, I do not see how any appropriate meaning can be given to the mere enduring of temptation, placed as it is between being sawn asunder and dying by the sword), died in the murder of the sword (i.e. were slain by the sword: see reff. One prophet only perished by the sword in the kingdom of Judah, viz. Urijah, Jer. xxvi. 23: but under Israel it is said, 1 Kings xix. 10, "They [the house of Omri] have slain thy prophets with the sword." Perhaps the Maccabean persecutions may again be before the Writer's mind: see 2 Macc. vii. 4. Chrysostom says beautifully, "What means this? what sayest thou? Some escaped the edge of the sword, and some died in the murder of

Examples of those who, though not put to violent death, lived lives of apparent wretchedness in the endurance of faith. They wandered about in sheepskins (the garment spoken of was the skin of any small kine with the hair on. The Septuagint use the word for Elijah's garment, to whom the allusion seems principally to be) and goatskins (this, coming after sheepskins, which may mean the same, has surprised some, and has seemed to them a mere gloss on that word. Perhaps the Writer regarded the former as merely the sheepskin, and mentioned the other because goats were as often kept and their skin as often worn); destitute, afflicted, in misery (see ver. 25); <sup>38</sup>.] of whom (viz. those who wandered about as in ver. 37: for the construction is resumed below, and in reference to these same persons. These all first occurs in the next verse) the world was not worthy (the world, by casting them out and persecuting them, proved that it was not fit to have them in it: condemned itself, in condemning them); wandering in deserts, and mountains, and caves, and the chinks of the earth (the Holy Land was especially calculated, by its geological formation, and its wildernesses, to afford shelter to persecuted persons: so did it to a hundred of the Lord's prophets whom Obadiah hid by fifty in a cave, 1 Kings xviii. 4, 13: to Elijah, ib. xix. 9, 13: to Mattathias and his sons, who fled to the mountains 1 Mace. ii. 28 f., and many others in the wilderness: to Judas Maccabæus, who fled with others into the wilderness and there lived in the mountains, like the wild beasts, 2 Mace. v. 27. See also ib. vi. 11, x. 6). <sup>39</sup>.]

And these all ("these, every one of them." All, viz. all that have been named or referred to throughout the chapter: not only those others since ver. 35), borne witness to by their faith (the emphasis is on being borne witness to, not on by their faith: and the sense is rather, "though borne witness to," than "being" or "because, borne witness to"), did not receive the promise (many promises indeed they did receive, ver. 33: but not THE PROMISE, the promise of final salvation, or as it is called, ch. ix. 15, "the promise of the eternal inheritance:" the perfection, to which without us they were not to attain. "But," says Delitzsch, "do we not read ch. vi. 15, of Abraham, he obtained the promise? Certainly, he has obtained the promise, yet not this side the grave, but, as we there maintained, in his life on the other side the grave: the general and actual salvation of the New Test. is, in their heavenly estate, the joy of the patriarchs. And this view is confirmed by looking forward to ch. xii., where the Old Test. believers translated into heaven are called the 'spirits of just men made perfect,' or at all events are included in that designation. And another question arises. It is said of the Old Test. saints, that they did not obtain the promise: but is it not plain, from ch. x. 36, that the obtaining the promise is for us also a thing future? Doubtless, but with a significant difference. For them, final salvation was a thing purely future: for us, it is a thing present as well as future: present, in that it is once for all brought about by Christ's offering of Himself: future, inasmuch as the unfolding of all the fulness of that which we possess, and the taking possession of it, when unfolded in its fulness, is for us yet to come: compare ch. ix. 28 with x. 11"), <sup>40</sup>.]

XII. <sup>1</sup> Wherefore let us also, having so great a cloud of witnesses encompassing us, <sup>a</sup> laying aside every <sup>a</sup> Col. iii. 8. <sup>1</sup> Pet. ii. 11.

God having provided (foreseen from afar) concerning us (viz. the Writer and his readers, as belonging to the New Test. church) something better (what is this? The Fathers generally interpret it of the ultimate state of glorious perfection, which shall only then come in, when all the number of the elect shall be accomplished. On this view, as Delitzsch says, the something better would consist in this, that the history of mankind has not been cut short, as it would have been if the ancients had received the promise in this sense, but has been continued for us to partake of our present privileges under the New Test. But, he continues, this narrow acceptation of the promise, as referring to the last things only, has against it not only what is said of Abraham in ch. vi. 15, that he "obtained the promise," but also the whole spirit of the Epistle, which regards final salvation as brought in with the propitiation of Christ, and the "end of the days" as begun with His first Advent. The Writer cannot be ignoring this all-inclusive beginning of the New Test. fulfilment of the promises, in attributing to us something better than the Old Test. believers had. And consequently we must understand by the expression, something better than they had, viz. the enjoyment, here, of the fulfilment of the promise, which they never had here, and only have there since Christ's descent into Hades and ascension into Heaven. It is that "something better" for which the Lord felicitates his disciples, Matt. xiii. 17, the revelation of the Son of God, ch. i. 1, the "salvation" of ch. ii. 3), that they should not apart from us be made perfect (the design of God in this provision of something better for us was, that they, the Old Test. saints, should not be perfected without us, i. e. independently of the New Test. salvation of which we are partakers,—cut off from Christ's universal Church, of which we are members. But we read, ch. xii. 23, of them as "made perfect" now. And therefore the Writer implies, as indeed ch. x. 14 seems to testify, that the Advent and work of Christ has changed the estate of the Old Test. Fathers and saints into greater and perfect bliss; an inference which is forced on us by many other places in Scripture. So that their perfection was dependent on our perfection: their and our perfection was all brought in at the same time, when Christ "by one offering perfected for ever them that are sanctified." So that the result with regard to them is, that their spirits, from the time when Christ descended into Hades and ascended up into heaven, enjoy heavenly blessedness, and are waiting, with all who have followed their glorified High Priest within the veil, for the resurrection of their bodies, the Regeneration, the renovation of all things. This thought naturally leads on to the opening verses of the next chapter).

CHAP. XII. 1—11.] EXHORTATION, mixed with reproof, on looking back at all these witnesses, and looking also to Jesus, who has come to glory through suffering, not to faint in the conflict with sin; nor to forget the love of our Father, who visits us with chastisement that we may bring forth the fruit of righteousness. This exhortation was begun at ch. x. 19, and broken off by the insertion of all those examples of the nature and triumphs of faith. It is now resumed, having, so to speak, accumulated new momentum by the interruption, and is pressed home directly on the readers.

1.] Wherefore (the word used is one of earnest and solemn inference;—"these things then being so . . .") we also (as well as those just enumerated), having so great a cloud (see below) of witnesses surrounding us (in order to understand this aright, we must bear in mind both the similitude here used, and the connexion with the preceding chapter. "This verse is altogether made up of words derived from the games," says Hammond. And this being so, who can help referring this cloud of witnesses which surrounds us to the scene in the games which is depicted, and regarding them as lookers on while our race is run? Whoever denies such reference, misses, it seems to me, the very point of the sense. But even thus we have not exhausted the meaning of the word witnesses. It is improbable, as Delitzsch well observes, that the Writer should have used the word "witnesses" so closely upon "borne witness to," ch. xi. 39, without any reference to that idea. See also ib. vv. 2, 4, 5. So that we can hardly help giving to 'witnesses' a sense not confined to their looking on upon us, but extending to their ethical condition of witnesses for the faith. But we may notice, that Delitzsch in contending for this double sense, has in fact a triple reference of the word to justify: they are borne witness to, they have their testimony, ch. xi. 5: and by this they become witnesses: and they carry out that office in being witnesses of our conflict here below. And now the propriety of the other words used at once appears. cloud, not only an immense multitude, and that number as it were pressing us all around as the spectators did the combatants in the circus,—but also fitly compared to a cloud from the fact of its being above us, they looking on from that heavenly bliss which they entered at Christ's triumph. So that the words must be taken as distinctly so far implying community between the church triumphant and the church below, that they who have entered into heavenly rest are conscious of what passes among ourselves. Any interpretation short of this leaves the exhortation here tame and without point. If they are merely quasi-witnesses, merely witnesses in a metaphor, the motive, as far as this clause supplies one, is gone. The best note on the whole idea and imagery is that of Schlichting: "He introduces us as it were into an immense theatre, where a vast crowd of spectators has assembled, which fills all the benches and spaces, seeming like a dense cloud poured around those contending in the middle. Before the eyes of such a multitude, and so many spectators, he represents us as contending. Now as of old such a multitude of spectators added courage to the combatants, and was a great stimulus to use every effort for victory: so to us also, so many witnesses, who also themselves have toiled in the same conflict, ought to add alacrity, and cause us to run with all our force the race which we have begun. And he calls them witnesses, not only in a figure, allusive to the spectators of a contest, as we have said, who are witnesses of the prowess of those who contend: but, and much more, because they witness concerning God and His goodness and justice, and all as with one mouth declare that God is, and is a rewarder of those who seek Him: that with Him, as the Chief Lord of the games, there is laid up a prize for earnest contenders: that He is true in His promises: that even after death He can render those happy who for His sake have given their lives. For, thirdly, they are specially to be understood in this place by the name, who by their blood, witness to the faithfulness and goodness of God. Whence they are par excellence called martyrs, i. e. witnesses"), laying aside all superfluous weight (the word means, any superfluous mass or burden). It is used doubtless here with direct reference to athletes, who before running trained themselves so as to get rid of all superfluous flesh: and also of weight accessory from without, as well as of weight carried on the person. So that the word may be taken of every weight of every kind which may weigh down the runner. Though, on account of what follows, I should understand it rather of weight of the person than weight on the person. See below), and sin, which doth naturally enwrap (the word thus rendered is used only here in all Greek literature, and is therefore somewhat difficult to interpret. The sum of what I have said on it in my Greek Test. is this, that it may best be understood "easily surrounding." And so the A. V., "which doth so easily beset us:" and by far the greater part of expositors, some with, some without the sense of active hostility. The word being thus taken, the various acceptations of the similitude intended are well summed up by Bleek: we must understand sin either as our inner propensity to sin, which clings fast to us, and will not part from us: or as a cumbersome garment girding us round and hindering us from running, or personified, as an adversary, who surrounds us on all sides, and waylays us to make us his prey; or generally, as something which lies about us and is ever ready to catch us: or which is ever from all sides standing in the way so as to entangle and impede our course. But the connexion with the verb, laying aside, which evidently Delitzsch feels, seems to me fatal to his view, and indeed to all views except that which makes sin to lie about us, as a garment, or beset us, as an inward propensity. Of both these laying aside may be said; of the former literally, of the latter figuratively. And in choosing between these two, I have no hesitation in preferring the former. The Writer is speaking of our race; and having expected us to lay aside all superfluous weight of body, which the athletes did, he passes to their other lightening for the race, viz., stripping naked, and exhorts us to put off sin, which lies so easily about us. Most likely perhaps the word sin alludes especially, though it need not exclusively, to apostasy. There does not seem to be any allusion to the different sins which may, in the sense now so common, and originally derived from this passage in A. V., "beset" various persons: though, of course, such an application of the passage is quite admissible, let us through (not merely 'with,' although we must so express ourselves in an English version, but as the state in, by means of which) endurance run the race set before us, <sup>2</sup> looking unto (so A. V. very exactly. There does not appear to be in the word here used any intimation of looking off from every thing else unto, as sometimes asserted) the Leader (one who precedes others by his example, they following him. But see note on ch. ii. 10. Author seems the best English word here, as there) and Perfecter (this is variously interpreted. The most likely meaning is that He perfected the faith, inasmuch as He perfected faith in his own person and example: but He perfected the faith also, inasmuch as He became the Author of perfect salvation to them that obey Him. His going before us in faith has made faith possible for us: His perfecting faith in his own person and example, has made faith effectual for us) of the faith (viz. that faith of which we have been speaking through ch. xi.: and thus rather "the faith" than "our faith," which latter is liable to the mistake so often made in English, viz. to being taken as if it meant faith in us, so that Jesus should be said to be "author and finisher" of each individual Christian's faith which he has within him. The word here may be rendered merely "faith" without the article; but it would seem most probable that the article here used in the original, whereas it was not throughout ch. xi., is intended to have a definite force. Besides which, the ascription of faith to our Lord is so plain in our Epistle, compare ch. ii. 13; iii. 2, that we must not seem to exclude this sense in our rendering, which we certainly do by "our faith;" whereas "the faith" includes both, and satisfies that which follows, in which His own example of endurance in prospect of triumph is set before us), [even] Jesus, who for (literally, instead of: see below) the joy set before Him (the words of the original thus rendered have been otherwise interpreted both by ancients and moderns. The ancient Syriac version, Beza, and others, take it to mean, "instead of the joy which He had before His incarnation." But this, though not an incorrect rendering, seems to me doubly objectionable. First, which many have noticed, joy which He already had could not well be designated as set before Him: and then, which I have not seen noticed, the term joy can hardly be used of a state of bliss in which one already is, a quiescent or pre-existent joy, but more naturally applies to joy prompted by some cause of active rejoicing. Then another modification of this same view is found in Chrysostom, viz., that the preferable alternative of escaping the cross was before Him, and He might have taken it, if He would. And so Luther, Calvin, and others. But this again, though it might satisfy the "set before Him," falls short of the above sense maintained for joy. Erasmus and others explain it, that He despised the joys of this life. This makes joy identical with pleasure, besides giving a low and unworthy sense to the joy set before Him, in making it to mean the pleasures of this life. The sense given above, "for the joy set before Him," i.e. as in comparison with, as in exchange for, the joy which was to come after, in the day of His triumph, is adopted by most Commentators, and is fully borne out both by usage, and the context) endured crucifixion, despising shame (or, "the shame:" but most probably every kind of shame, even to that of the shameful death which He died), and is set down (the perfect tense gives the state of triumph as it now endures, having happened) on the right hand of the throne of God (i.e. on the throne of God, at His right hand: see on ch. viii. 1; and compare Rev. iii. 21).

3.] For (meaning, "and there is reason in what I say;" looking to Him, for He like yourselves had much and continual conflict with the sinners of His day) compare (with yourselves: think on, by way of comparison: "consider Him, as set in comparison with yourselves") Him who hath endured (perfect again, to set before them Christ as not merely a character of the past, but one ever present) such contradiction (the contradiction need not be confined to words, but may also be in deeds) by the sinners against Himself (the A. V. is ambiguous: in it, the sentence may mean either "the contradiction | of sinners | against Himself," "against" being taken with "contradiction," which is wrong,—or "the contradiction | of sinners against Himself," "against" being taken with "sinners," which is right. In the text, the ambiguity is removed), that ye weary not, fainting in your souls. 4.]

Bengel's remark, which De Wette charges with pedantry, "from the race he comes to boxing, as Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 26," is nevertheless a just one. Not yet have ye resisted unto blood (many take this to mean, have not yet sacrificed your lives: so Chrysostom, "ye have undergone spoiling of your goods, defamation, banishment, but not yet this." And it may be so: but I would rather abide by the idea of the pugilistic figure being intended, and apply unto blood to the figure, not to the interpretation. Seneca says: "An athlete cannot bring great courage to the contest who has never been bruised. He who has seen his own blood, whose teeth have crashed beneath the fist, he who has been thrown and borne the weight of his adversary on him, and has not been prostrated in his spirit, who as often as he has fallen has risen more indomitable in spirit, he it is who comes down to the fight with great hope." On the relation of such passages as this to the date of the Epistle, see in the Introduction, § ii. 29 ff.), tending against sin (personified, as an adversary: not to be limited in its meaning to sin in themselves, or to sin in their persecutors, but understood of both. Delitzsch, who would confine it to the latter, says that it was not sin in themselves which would shed their blood, but rather, which would spare its being shed. Yes, and for this very reason the resisting that sin of unfaithfulness which would lead them to spare their blood, would, if carried far enough, lead to the shedding of it. Similarly, the sin in their persecutors, which they were to resist, would, if yielded to, spare their blood by seducing them into apostasy).

5, 6.] And ye have completely forgotten (or, have ye completely forgotten . . . ? but the affirmative form is more probable than the interrogative) the exhortation, the which (that kind of exhortation, of which the following is a specimen) discourses with you as with sons. My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when corrected by Him (in the Hebrew, "and have no aversion to His correction"): for whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth, yea, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth (this clause is very different in the Hebrew and our English Bible: "even as a father the son in whom he delighteth." See on the difference in my Greek Test. Receiveth, i. e., takes to him as a veritable son, receives in his heart and cherishes).

7, 8.] Application of the passage of Scripture to the readers.

7.] The question of the various reading here can hardly be made intelligible to the English reader. The meaning is, "It is for chastisement that ye are enduring, not for punishment, not for any evil purpose." "Your endurance, like His endurance, will not be thrown away. He had joy before Him, you have life (ver. 9) before you."

It is for chastisement that ye are enduring: as with sons God is dealing with you. For what son is there whom the (i. e., his) father chasteneth not?

8.] But if ye are without (separate from, no partakers in) chastisement, of which all (God's sons: or those above mentioned, ch. xi., which is better, on account of the perfect verb) have been made partakers, then ye are bastards (beneath the attention and affectionate superintendence of the father), and not sons.

9.] Then again (this brings in a fresh argument: "furthermore," as A. V.) we once had (the tense is imperfect, and is used of a state of former habit) the fathers of our flesh (see below) as chastisers (the fathers is the object, chastisers the predicate: not as A. V., "we have had fathers of our flesh who corrected us," which is an ungrammatical rendering), and revered them: shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits (or, of our spirits. But [see also below] the other is more majestic, and more in accord with the text which probably was before the Writer's mind, Numb. xvi. 22, and again xxvii. 16), and live (viz. in life, eternal)? An inquiry arises out of the expression here used, in what sense our earthly fathers are said to be the fathers of our flesh, and God the Father of (our) spirits. I have given in my Greek Test. the various opinions, and have come to this conclusion, that I would understand the expression as an exalted contrast of God, a Spirit Himself, and the Creator of spirits, His like, to men, flesh themselves, and the progenitors of fleshly bodies, their like.

10.] The argument from the stronger consideration is strengthened, by bringing out the difference between the two chastisements as to their character. For they indeed (our earthly parents)

 yieldeth the peaceable fruit
 of righteousness unto them

for a few days (see the meaning below) chastised us after their own pleasure (according to that which seemed good to them: their standard and rule of action in the matter was at best their own view of what was right, and too often their own caprice or temper); but He in order to that which is profitable, in order to our partaking of His holiness (the becoming partakers of God's holiness is manifestly to be taken subjectively: becoming holy like Him). Two questions arise regarding this verse, 1) what is the intended reference of for a few days? 2) What are the clauses opposed to one another? The former of these questions in fact involves the latter. for a few days has been understood by many of the duration of our natural life, as the term to which the chastisement of our natural parents had reference, whereas that of our heavenly Father regarded eternity. But this cannot be the meaning of the Writer. For in the first place it is not true that all earthly correction had regard only to the present life. And in the next, there is not one word in the latter clause expressing the eternal nature of God's purpose, which surely there would have been. The other interpretation, 'during and in reference to the time of our being subject to their chastisement,' is certainly the right one. Then we come to the second question, how the antitheses are to be arranged. Some have thought that "for a few days" is to be supplied in the second member of the sentence also: seeing that the divine chastisement, like the human, lasts for a few days only, i. e. for the term of this time of trial. Others again would supply in the second member some contrast to the term "for a few days." Surely the true antithesis is that pointed out by the order of the clauses themselves, and by their correspondence: 1) "for a few days," and "for our profit," 2) "after their pleasure," and "that we may be partakers of his holiness." In 1), we have set over against one another, — the short time during which, the temporary reference with which, their chastisement was inflicted,—and the great purpose implied as eternal from its very expression as that which is profitable for an immortal being, for which He chastises us: and in 2), are opposed,—their purpose and standard of action, to satisfy their own seeming, be it good or bad,—and His purpose, to make us partakers of His holiness, which holiness, absolute and pure, is His rule of acting, and no mere pleasure of His own. Thus all is straightforward, and no clause need be supplied. 11.] Recurrence to the common ground of ver. 8, in describing the attribute of all chastisement, divine as well as human. In asserting what he does of all chastisement, the Writer lets fall out of view the capricious nature and uncertain result of human chastisement, and regards it more as a type and representative of that which is divine:—all chastisement, properly so called, and answering its proper purpose. This is brought out in the second clause: the first is equally true of every sort of chastisement. Now (introducing an axiom to which all will assent) all chastisement for ('during and in respect of') the time present seems (the reality, as Chrysostom remarks, being otherwise) not to be matter of joy, but of grief: but afterwards it yields peaceable fruit of righteousness (the genitive is one of apposition; the righteousness is the fruit, the chastisement being the tree. The words are sometimes otherwise taken, making righteousness that which yields the fruit. But seeing that chastisement yields fruit, it must be its own fruit, and not that belonging to righteousness, that it yields. And this fruit, thus considered, is the practical righteousness which springs from faith, not the forensic righteousness which comes by faith [as in Rom. v. 1]. And this fruit is called peaceful, in contrast to the contest by which it is won: it is, as Tholuck expresses it, "fruit of righteousness to be enjoyed in peace after the conflict") to those who have been exercised by it (viz. chastisement. The word exercised is a clear reference to the conflict alluded to in the former verses).

12—17.] Further exhortation rather to promote the running the Christian race, and to take care, following peace and holiness, that there be no bitter root of sin among them, which, as in Esau's case, might deprive them of the promised blessing.

12.] Wherefore (connects with the reasoning, and also with the imagery, of the foregoing verses:—because suffering chastisement is the part of God's sons—because the running the race successfully brings joy and peace) put straight again (into their proper places) the relaxed hands, and the paralyzed knees;

13.] and make straight tracks for your feet (these words are quoted in substance from Prov. iv. 26. In the Septuagint the A. V. has "ponder the paths of thy feet." The word means properly the mark left by the wheel, the rut or wheel-mark, indicating a track or road. The meaning seems to be, Let your walk be so firm and so unanimous in the right direction, that a plain track and highway may be thereby established for those who accompany and follow you to perceive and walk in. Compare Isa. xxxv. 8), that that which is lame be not turned out of the way, but rather be healed ("that which is lame," indicates that part of the church which was wavering between Christianity and Judaism: answering to the "weak" of the Epistle to the Romans. If the whole congregation, by their united and consistent walk, trod a plain and beaten path for men's feet, these lame ones, though halting, would be easily able to keep in it, and by keeping in the straight track, would even acquire the habit of walking straight onward, and so be healed: but if the tracks were errant and confused, their erratic steps would deviate more and more, till at length they fell away out of the right way altogether. It should be noticed that the Writer has still the image of a race before him. The making a beaten track for all is, that they may not miss the way and lose the prize).

14.] Follow peace with all (with all belongs to peace, not to the verb. Some have understood all to refer not only to the brethren, but to unbelievers also. But thus taken, the exhortation would lose much of its proper force here. For it is introduced by a caution that the lame be not turned out of the way, and followed by taking heed that none fail of the grace of God: and between these two an exhortation to follow peace with all mankind would come in very flat and disjointed. It is clearly the brethren who are here meant by all. The sentiment thus is the same as in Rom. xiv. 19), and sanctification (holiness is not sanctification, but the putting on of it and becoming holy. Many Commentators, misled by the peculiar contextual reference of the word in 1 Thess. iv. 3, have restricted the meaning here to chastity. But the wider meaning, as a rule, must always be kept where the context does not require a narrower. And thus understood, the reference of it is well given by Limborch: "That they should not, while anxious for peace, by too great wish to please others, commit any fault against Christian holiness"), without (apart from) which none shall see the Lord (whether the Lord is to be applied to Christ, or to the Father, is uncertain. It is clearly the Father in ch. viii. 2: as clearly the Son in ch. ii. 3. But here it would seem that the Father is intended. For we know, Matt. xxiv. 30; Rev. i. 7, that every eye shall see the Son, even in His glory: whereas we have our Lord using, in an ethical sentence not much unlike this one, the expression "they shall see God"):

fail of the grace of God; lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby many be defiled; <sup>16</sup> lest there be any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright. <sup>17</sup> For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with looking well lest any one falling short of the grace of God (see on ch. iv. 1. The whole sentence is imitated from Deut. xxix. 18: and the sense passes on to the verb trouble you below),—lest any root of bitterness (not the same as “bitter root,” but bitterness is the origin and the ingrained character of the root, not its mere attribute. So Chrysostom well, “He says not, ‘bitter,’ but, of bitterness. For a bitter root might bring forth sweet fruit, but a root and fount and foundation of bitterness can never bear sweet fruit: for all things are bitter, it has nothing sweet; all is bitter, all is unsweet, all is full of hate and abomination”) springing up,—trouble you, and by its means the many (the whole congregation: see Gal. v. 9 quoted below) be polluted (how? by intercourse, by compromise, by over-persuasion, by imitation. The kind of pollution he explains in the next verse to arise from fornication and profanity); lest (there be) any fornicator (to be taken literally, not as alluding to spiritual fornication, see Deut. xxxi. 16; Exod. xxxiv. 15 f.: for as Delitzsch observes, this sense is foreign to the New Test., except in the Apocalypse: and it is very unlikely that the Writer should have used a meaning lying so far from the context, and not suggested either by the passage of Deut. to which he was before alluding, or by the history of Esau which he is now introducing. Nearly connected with the question of the sense of fornicator, is that of the punctuation: whether by a comma after it we are to sever it from connexion with Esau, or not. Most Commentators join it with what follows: and explain it partly of the gluttony of Esau, partly of his having wedded strange women, partly by the character of a fornicator which is given him by later Jewish tradition. But others divide the word fornicator from what follows. It seems hardly possible to decide. The character of Esau, from Scripture as well as tradition, will very well bear the designation fornicator: and the balance of the sentence is better preserved by applying both to him, than by leaving the word fornicator insulated), or profane person (a man of low views, who has no appreciation of any high or divine thing), as Esau, who for one meal sold his own birthright (the reflexive his own, which must be read, may seem to be superfluous; but it serves to intensify the unworthiness of the act). 17.] For (gives a reason for the caution, from the terrible result in Esau's case) ye know (it was a fact of which no Hebrew could be ignorant) that when he afterward on his part (he dishonoured his inheritance, but was in his turn rejected from the blessing) wished to inherit the blessing, he was rejected (some supply by God, some by his father. But there is no reason why both should not be joined. His father's blessing was God's blessing; his father's rejection was God's rejection): for he found not place of repentance (whose repentance, his own, or his father's! The former is held by all the Greek expositors: by Luther, Calvin, and many others. The latter, by Beza, and most of the moderns. But the former I believe to be the only admissible sense. It is no mean argument for it, that the Fathers thought not of the other, though it would have been so useful to them in the Novatian controversy. Theodore of Mopsuestia, though he wrests the passage from those who wished to preclude repentance, never hints at any other meaning. And thus referred to Esau himself, it will mean, that he found no way open to reverse what had been done, by repentance: the sin had been committed and the consequence entailed, irrevocably. He might change, but the penalty could not, from the very nature of the circumstances, be taken off. So that repentance, in its full sense, had no place. And such is the meaning of a place for repentance, wherever occurring. We do not mean by it an opportunity to repent in a man's own bosom, to be sorry for what he has done, for this may be under any circumstances, and this might have been with Esau: but we mean, a chance, by repenting, to repair. So when a condemned criminal has a place for repentance allowed him, we do not mean that he may die penitent, but that he is reprieved. I see not how else to understand this, and what follows: and this understood nothing can be plainer), although he earnestly sought it (what? not the blessing, as many think, for this would be, as Ebrard characterizes it, most unnatural, the antecedent being thus separated from the pronoun "it" by a whole intervening clause, which will not bear parenthesizing. . . . Regarding repentance then as the only admissible antecedent for it, the explanation will be very simple. Place for repentance is, in fact, repentance. He found no place for repentance: if he had found one, repentance would have been secured: this was what he sought) with tears (Gen. xxvii. 38. It is obvious, that our passage, rightly understood, cannot by any means favour the exclusion of any sinner from repentance. In Esau's case the place for repentance was closed, by circumstances themselves: the blessing had been given and could not be recalled. And this is our warning. It may be so, in many cases, with us. That it is always so, is not even hinted: but warning is given us that a path is not safe where even such a possibility may be encountered. See Prov. i. 24—32).

18—29.] Connected with what has preceded by for. Take heed that there be not such [as in vv. 15, 16] among you: for (not only have we the solemn warning of Esau, but) we are not under the law with its terrors, but under the Gospel with its promises,—hearing one who speaks for the last time, who speaks from heaven—and receiving a kingdom which shall not be moved.

18, 19.] For (see above) ye have not drawn near to ('in your approaching unto God [in the original text], it has not been to . . . ?' The A. V. 'ye are not come to,' omits the approach to God, implied in the words draw near) that which was being touched (so literally: "mountain" must be understood, which is expressed below with Zion, and hence has come in as a gloss here. That might be touched has been variously interpreted. Some understand it, touched by the fire of God, compare Ps. ciii. 32, "He toucheth the hills, and they smoke." But this seems hardly consistent with the present participle, nor indeed at all with the sense of the word itself, which is to touch by feeling about, as a blind man does. And this sense will I believe fit our passage very well. Mount Sinai was a material mountain, which not only might be touched,—but was being touched, would have been touched by the people had it not been forbidden), and which was burnt (kindled) with fire (the same expression occurs in Deut. iv. 11, v. 23, where nearly the same words, "darkness, clouds, and thick darkness," follow), and to blackness, and darkness, and tempest (see Deut. iv. 11, cited above), and to sound of trumpet (see Exod. xix. 16. The Writer avoids the word "voice" there used, having so soon to speak of "the voice of words"), and the voice of words; which they who heard intreated that (more) discourse should not

The person of Moses being interposed, in some degree mitigated their fear"): <sup>20, 21.</sup> Parentetical, explaining the reason of this horror on the part of the hearers. For they could not bear that which was commanded, Even if a beast (much more if a man) touch the mountain, it shall be stoned (unabbreviation of Exod. xix. 12, 13): and (this clause is diversely punctuated. Before Beza, there was no comma at and, and the sense was read straight on, "And so terrible was the sight, [that] Moses said"—as in A. V. And thus, as Bleek well observes, should we have punctuated in an Epistle of St. Paul, who is full of these broken constructions. But nothing can be more different than the style of this Epistle, which is weighed and rhetorically balanced with constant care. There can be little doubt in any who take this style into account, that the punctuation which began with Beza is right, viz. the setting a comma at and, and regarding so terrible was the sight, as a parenthesis), —so fearful was that which was revealed (which appeared to them as a vision of the glory and majesty of Jehovah), Moses said, I am in great terror and in trembling (no such saying of Moses at this time is to be found in the sacred narrative. In Deut. ix. 19, he says, "I was afraid" (in the Septuagint, "I am afraid")): but this refers to the time when Moses went up to the mount after he had broken the tables. Our Writer probably transfers these words from that time to this, indicative of the terror which Moses felt at the divine presence on Sinai. Some have supposed that the saying is taken from some tradition: but none has been found to justify the idea):

<sup>22–24.</sup> Contrast to the above negation, in setting forth that to which they are come. But ye have drawn near, both congregations drew near, Deut. iv. 11: the difference is in that, to which. So that Chrysostom misses the mark when he says, "They drew not near, but stood afar off: so even did Moses: but ye have drawn near") to mount Sion (here at length the word mountain is expressed: see above. Mount Sion, the abode of God which He loved and where He will abide continually, is used to signify, not its mere representative, which men know by that name, but the reality, God's own abode in heaven. See Ps. lxxviii. 68, ex. 2, exxxii. 13 ff.; Isa. ii. 2 f., xxviii. 16; Joel ii. 32; Micah iv. 1 f.; Obad. 17, &c.), and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem (as the earthly Jerusalem, situate on Mount Zion, was the city of the great King, Matt. v. 35, so in a more blessed sense is that heavenly city the city of the living God. He is its maker and builder, ch. xi. 10: nor only so, but also evermore dwells in it with the light of His presence, cf. Rev. xxi. 22–24):

<sup>23.</sup> The difficult question of the punctuation has been dealt with in my Greek Testament. The matter would be unintelligible to the English reader. It is enough to say that the Writer begins with the innumerable company (literally myriads), in order afterwards to say of what these myriads consist. Adopting then this arrangement, the verse will stand, —and to myriads (the word is commonly used of the angelic company surrounding Jehovah), the festal host (so the word imports) of angels, and the assembly of the first-born which are written in heaven (who are these? Why are they put with the angels? Why does the Writer place God the Judge of all between the assembly of the firstborn and the spirits of just men made perfect? These, says Delitzsch, are three closely connected questions, and among the very hardest in our Epistle. The answers to them are very various. Many understand the assembly of the firstborn of the firstfruits of the Christian church (Rev. xiv. 4): so De Wette, "those who are fallen asleep in the faith of Christ, and possibly also glorified by martyrdom, who have entered earlier than others, as it were the firstborn, into blissful union with God and Christ." As Delitzsch observes, if we hold them to be martyrs, the following words, and to God the Judge of all, might have a certain propriety from Rev. vi. 9 f., where the souls of the martyrs under the altar cry, "How long . . . dost thou not judge and avenge our blood, &c.!" But this view seems altogether to fail when we attempt to explain by it the words, written in heaven. Those of whom our Lord says, Luke x. 20, "Rejoice, because your names are written in heaven," are yet living on earth. According to St. Luke's manner of speaking, the firstborn are hereby designated as enrolled (in Luke ii. 1, 3, 5, he uses the word here rendered "written" for enrolling in the census) in the heavenly roll: and Scripture usage seems to demand that we consider one thus described, as not yet in possession of everlasting life in the fullest sense, but as destined to life [see Acts xiii. 48]. This would forbid us from thinking of the 144,000 whom St. John saw with the Lamb on the heavenly Zion, who bore on their foreheads the name of the Lamb and of the Father. For this sealing was among the insignia of their eternal glorification: whereas the being enrolled in the book of life is the token to us, while here below, of our heavenly citizenship, and seems to lose all its significance, as soon as we have entered the heavenly city and need no assurance of our citizenship either for ourselves or for others. So that though we are tempted, both by the fact of their being classed with the angels, and by their being firstborn (so we have "firstfruits from among men," Rev. xiv. 4), to identify these with the thousands seen by St. John, we must give up the parallel, these persons written in heaven being not yet citizens of heaven who have taken up their full citizenship by passing through death, but persons to whom their citizenship is assured, they being as yet here below. Add to which, that they are distinguished from the spirits of just men made perfect, by the term assembly or church [ecclesia]: and that it would be difficult or rather impossible, on this hypothesis, to give any account of the sense or arrangement of the two following clauses. Just as inadmissible is it, or even more so, to understand by the firstborn the patriarchs and saints of the Old Test., and then by spirits of just men made perfect, not the Old Test. but the New Test. saints. So that, to say nothing of other varieties of interpretation not worth mentioning, there is no way left but to see, in the words, the assembly of the firstborn written in heaven, THE CHURCH BELOW. And this view, far from being a last refuge, is justified by every consideration. For 1) thus ecclesia is explained, which every where, when used of men and not of angels, Ps. lxxxix. 5, designates the assembly of saints on earth: 2) the adjunct written in heaven is accounted for, indicating as it does the heavenly charter of the church below, the invisible side of their sonship and citizenship (see 1 John iii. 2), with which in this description of heaven we are mainly concerned: 3) we get an explanation of the choice of the term firstborn to describe Christian believers. The Writer having given the warning example of Esau, who for a morsel of meat sold his birthright, has prepared the way for such a designation, while at the same time, as Knapp rightly remarks, the long sentence beginning at ver. 18 aims at this "that Christians may be defended against unbelief, and may learn to know their rights of inheritance." There is no distinction between first-born and later-born Christians, but all Christians as such are called firstborn because of their heritorship of the heavenly inheritance. We may also remark that thus the analogy with the firstborn of Israel is completely fulfilled. They were dedicated to God specially as his priests (Exod. xiii. 1, 2, 11—15), and royal succession was in the first-born: so that in the word firstborn we have that which St. John says: "He made us a kingdom, priests to God and His Father." This primogeniture, which belonged to Israel as such (Exod. iv. 22), belongs to Christians as such, and to every one of them: they are enrolled not merely in an earthly register, Num. iii. 42, but in the book of life in heaven. We also thus 4) obtain an explanation of the juxtaposition in the sentence of the myriads of angels and the myriads of the firstborn: the key to it being found in ch. i. 14, where God is said to have apportioned the angels as ministering spirits to minister to the heirs of salvation. Thus we have the heavenly spirits and the first-born whose names are in heaven, the jubilant choir above and the militant church below, ranged together. But 5) we also get, what we find on no other hypothesis, an explanation of the sequence of God the judge of all on the assembly of the first-born, and of that of spirits of just men made perfect on God the judge of all. The key to the words is in ch. x. 30, "The Lord shall judge His people." The church militant here below brings to mind those enemies and persecutors, for deliverance and righting from whom she looks to the righteous judgment of God. And he who is in fellowship (1 John i. 7) with the great Judge has no judgment to fear, but is justified; thereby leading on to the "spirits of just men made perfect" which follows), and to God the Judge of all (this clause comes between the mention of the elect, written in heaven, and the spirits of the just, shewing that the enrolment in heaven is no arbitrary selection,—the justification no unreasonable procedure. It is not improbable that the Writer may have had in view Abraham's question Gen. xviii. 25, "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?" Some Commentators understand this, "God, the Judge of all," of Christ: but it is a characteristic of this Epistle that all judgment is formally, and in words, referred to God the Father: see ch. iv. 11 f., x. 30 f.: ver. 29: ch. xiii. 1), and to the spirits of just men who have been perfected (i.e. the whole number of the just who have passed into their rest, from righteous Abel downwards; not yet absolutely called "just men made perfect," because they are as yet disembodied and awaiting the resurrection, but "the spirits of just men made perfect." This making perfect has been through sufferings, through trials, through running and having ended their race. All is accomplished, their probation, their righteousness, God's purposes respecting them. They are not sleeping, they are not unconscious, they are not absent from us: they are perfected, lacking nothing, except, and that is our defect because we are as yet imprisoned in an un-spiritual body, communion with us: their spirits are perfect, and therefore not suspended from the spirit life, but waiting only for bodily perfection also), and to the mediator of the latter covenant, Jesus (the mention of the just made perfect at once introduces that of Him who was Himself made perfect, ch. ii. 10, and who is the perfecter of the faith, ver. 2. See ch. vii. 22. Our Writer especially loves to use the name JESUS. To Christ, all that is predicated of our Lord belonged officially: but when it is predicated of Jesus, it becomes personal fact, realized in one whom we know and who loves us. That Christ is the mediator of the new covenant, is a theological truth: that Jesus is, is a glorious token of God's love manifested to us men), and to the blood of sprinkling (naturally following on the mention of the covenant, for no covenant is consecrated without blood, ch. ix. 18, 22. And if Moses had blood wherewith to sprinkle the people, much more Jesus, of whom Moses was a shadow. And therefore the Writer, enumerating the great differences of our Sion from their Sinai, though he has not recounted their blood of sprinkling, as not being worthy of mention in the face of the terrors of God's law, mentions ours, by which we were redeemed unto God, and assigns it a place in the heavenly city, next to, but separate from, Jesus Himself in His glorified state. If we come to enquire how this can be, we enter on an interesting but high and difficult subject, on which learned and holy men have been much divided. Our Lord's Blood was shed from Him on the Cross. And as His Body did not see corruption, it is obvious to suppose, that His Blood did not corrupt as that of ordinary men, being as it is so important a portion of the body. Hence, and because His resurrection Body seems to have been bloodless,—see Luke xxiv. 32; John xx. 27, and notes,—some have supposed that the Blood of the Lord remains, as it was poured out, incorruptible, in the presence of God. On such a matter I would neither affirm nor deny, but mention, with all reverence, that which seems to suit the requirements of the words before us. By that Blood we live, wherever it is : but as here it is mentioned separately from the Lord Himself, as an item in the glories of the heavenly city, and as “yet speaking,” it seems to require some such view to account for the words used. Bengel has here a long excursus on the point, in which he takes strongly the above view. Chrysostom also seems to have done so. The blood of Christ is called “the blood of sprinkling,” inasmuch as, like that sacrificial blood of old materially, it is spiritually sprinkled on the conscience of those who come unto God by Him, compare ch. ix. 13 ff.; x. 22; xiii. 12) speaking better (adverbially; as in 1 Cor. vii. 38, doing better is opposed to doing well. And the adverb refers not to the manner of the speaking, but to the matter spoken; so that “better things” in the English expresses well the meaning) than Abel (not, “than that of Abel,” for in ch. xi. 4, it is Abel himself who speaks, in his blood : see note there). <sup>25</sup>] This voice of the blood of sprinkling, just mentioned, leads naturally to the caution not to despise that voice, nor put it by as they of old did the “voice of words” from Sinai. Take heed that ye decline not (see above on ver. 19) him that speaketh (i. e. God in Christ, see below). For if they did not escape (how? in one of two senses: either 1) they did not escape hearing the voice on account of this their refusal: or 2) which seems more probable, they did not escape God’s vengeance in punishment: the Writer taking this their refusal of the divine voice as a sort of sample of their disobedient and unbelieving spirit), declining as they did (not “who refused”) him who spoke on earth (on Mount Sinai), much more we (shall not escape), who are turning away from him (who speaks) from (the) heavens : —We now come to the somewhat difficult question, the answer to which we have taken for granted in the rendering of this verse : viz., who are intended by the various objects, “him that speaketh,”—“him that speaketh on earth,”—“him from heaven.” Let us take the second of these first, as furnishing the key to the others. “Whom does he mean (says Chrysostom) ? It seems to me, Moses.” But this cannot well be. For the participle refusing, manifestly refers back to ver. 19 : where it was not Moses, but God, whom they refused. It must be laid down then as certain, that he that speaketh on earth is God. Then if so, who is he from heaven, or in other words who is he that speaketh, for these two are manifestly the same? Clearly, not Jesus : for by the words whose voice, which follow, the voice of this same speaker shook the earth at the giving of the law : and it can by no ingenuity be pretended, that the terrors of the law proceeded from the Son of God ; especially in the face of the contrast drawn here, and in ch. ii. 2 ff. And it would be against all accuracy and decorum in divine things, to pass from the speaking of the God of Israel to that of our Lord Jesus Christ in the way of climax as is here done, with “much more shall we not escape.” Add to which, that, if Christ is to be understood as the subject of vv. 26 ff., we shall have Him uttering the prophetic words, “yet once more, &c.,” whereas both from our Writer’s habit of quoting prophecy [compare ch. i. 1; iv. 7; vi. 13; viii. 8; xi. 11], and from the context of the prophecy itself, they must be attributed to the Father. How then are these difficulties to be got over? Simply by taking as above, the speaker in both cases to be God : in the first, as speaking from Mount Sinai by His Angels : in the second, as speaking from His heavenly throne through His exalted Son. Thus it is true we lie open to one objection, viz. that the giving of the law is ever regarded in the Old Test. as a speaking from heaven : so Exod. xx. 22 ; Deut. iv. 36 ; Neh. ix. 13. But this objection, though at first sight weighty, is by no means decisive. The "heaven" spoken of there is surely nothing but the material heaven, as apparent to the Israelites in the clouds and darkness which rested on Sinai, and totally distinct from the "heaven" here, the site of our blessed Lord's glorification, who is spoken of, ch. iv. 14, as "having passed through the heavens." Thus the words have been explained from early times.

<sup>26.</sup>] whose voice (see on last verse) shook the earth then (so in Judg. v. 5, in Deborah's Song, "The earth trembled ; the mountains melted from before the Lord, even that Sinai from before the God of Israel." See also Ps. cxiv. 7. In Exod. xix. 18, where the A. V. has, after the Hebrew, "the whole mount quaked greatly,"—the Septuagint render, "The whole people was much astonished." Some take this shaking of the earth to be meant of a figurative excitement of men's minds. But there can be little doubt, that the material explanation is the true one): but now (now, not only in an argumentative sense, "as the case now is," but here in a more temporal sense, as opposed to then : now, under the prophetic revelations since the captivity,—under the New Test. dispensation in which those prophecies will find their fulfilment) hath He (God : see above) promised, saying, Yet once (more) and I will shake not only the earth, but also the heaven. The prophecy in Haggai is uttered, like the whole of his prophecies, with reference to the second temple, which was then rising out of the ruins of the first, smaller indeed and poorer, but destined to witness greater glories. It was to be the scene of the last revelation of Jehovah to His people : and the house of David, then so low, was to rise above the ruins of the thrones of the earth, and endure as the signet on God's right hand (Hagg. ii. 21—23). It is this ruin of earthly powers, this antitypical shaking of the earth and all that is in it, after the typical material shaking at Sinai, of which the prophet speaks. And the result of this shaking was to be, that the desire, or best treasures, of all nations (not to be understood personally of Christ, but as in the Septuagint, "the chosen things of all the nations shall come") should be brought to adorn that temple. The expression here (as in the Septuagint) rendered "yet once . . ." is in the Hebrew, "yet once, it is a little while, and:" i. e. the period which shall elapse shall be but one, not admitting of being broken into many ; and that one, but short. Thus the prophecy seems to point to the same great final bringing of all the earth under the Kingdom of God, which is spoken of in Zechariah xiv., when the Lord shall come and all His saints with Him, the great antitype of Sinai (see Deut. xxxiii. 2), so often the subject of ancient prophecy. It is clearly wrong, with some interpreters, to understand this shaking of the mere breaking down of Judaism before the Gospel, or of any thing which shall be fulfilled during the Christian economy, short of its glorious end and accomplishment. The not only . . . but, which the Writer has substituted for the simple "and" of the Septuagint, is adopted for the sake of bringing out the point which is before him, the earth, and the speaking from the earth, on the one hand, the heaven, and the speaking from the heaven, on the other. But the heaven here, that is to be shaken, is the material heaven stretched above this earth.

<sup>27.</sup>] But (now) this Yet once (more) indicates the removal of the things shaken, as of things which have been made, in order that the things which are not (i. e. cannot be) shaken may abide (the great final shaking which is to introduce the accomplished kingdom of God is that after which there shall be no other. To what does in order that belong? Two ways of taking the sentence are possible. 1) That given above, to the consideration of which I will presently return. 2) We may join in order that, &c., not with the fact pointed at, the removal of the things shaken, as its purpose, but with the verb, have been made; 'as of things which have been made in order that the things which cannot be shaken may remain:' i. e. the scope of Creation has been, the establishing of the kingdom of Redemption: that it, the transitory and baseless, may pass away when its work is fulfilled, and give place to that which shall never pass away. This view is strongly taken by Delitzsch, after Grotius, Bengel, Tholuck, and others. But I cannot accede to it, beautiful as is the thought, and strictly true, that Creation was made but to subserve Redemption: the things removeable, to give place to the things unremoveable. For, a) the word remain will thus have an exceedingly awkward elliptic sense, "that the things which cannot be shaken may remain," i. e. "may come into the place of those removed, and thus abide for ever:" for things which cannot be shaken remaining merely, would be a matter of course. b) the logical propriety as well as the rhythm of the sentence is thus destroyed. For we should on this rendering have the clause beginning with "in order that" entirely subordinated to the word made, and indicating, not the purpose of the main action of the sentence, but that of the creation, a matter lying quite out of the present record. So that, it seems to me, we must fall back on 1), viz. the making in order that to belong to "the remaining," the action of the sentence. This, it is true, is not without difficulty. For, a) even thus we must go some little out of our way for a sense for remain, though not so far as in the other case. It must then mean, may remain over, when the things shaken are gone: may be permanently left: to which sense there is no objection, but it does not exactly fit the requirements of the sentence: b) if the term which have been made be taken absolutely, we might be met by the citation from Isa. lxvi. 22, to shew that the new heavens and the new earth are also made: see also Isa. lxxv. 17, 18. The answer to this must be, though I own it is not altogether a satisfactory one, that the making is not the same in the two cases: that this word carries rather with it made with hands, of this creation, as that word is explained, ch. ix. 11: whereas the other I make rests in the almighty power of God, by which the spirit-world as well as the world of sense was called into existence. See by all means, on the whole, Luke xxi. 26).

<sup>28.]</sup> Wherefore (gathers its inference, not from the whole preceding paragraph, but from the yet once more shaking and consequent removing of earthly things before those things which shall remain) receiving as we do a kingdom which cannot be shaken (the participle, receiving, is descriptive of our Christian state of privilege and expectation: designating us by anticipation as in possession of that, whose firstfruits and foretastes we do actually possess), let us have thankfulness (so Chrysostom, and most Commentators, ancient and modern. Others render, as the A. V., "let us have, or hold fast grace," which is hardly a legitimate rendering. So the Syriac, Beza, Estius, Schlichting, Grotius, and others. On the sense, see Ps. l. 23, "Whoso offereth me thanks and praise, he honoureth me"), by which (thankfulness) let us serve (this cannot be taken as in A. V., "by which we may serve," but must be hortatory like the other) God well-pleasingly with reverent submission and fear (see on ch. v. 7) <sup>29.]</sup> For

And thus the fact that God's anger continues to burn now, as then, against those who reject his Kingdom, is brought in; and in the background lie all those gracious dealings, by which the fire of God's presence and purity becomes to His people, while it consumes their vanity and sin and earthly state, the fire of purity and light and love for their enduring citizenship of His kingdom).

CHAP. XIII. 1-16.] Various exhortations to Christian virtues: more especially to the imitation of the faith of their leaders who had departed in the Lord: to firmness in the faith: and following of Jesus, who suffered outside the camp to teach us to bear His reproach.

1.] Let brotherly love (the word signifies, in the classics, the love of brothers and sisters for one another; in the New Test., the love of the Christian brethren) remain (we learn from the Acts,—on the hypothesis of this Epistle being addressed to the church at Jerusalem [on which however see Introd.],—how eminent this brotherly love had been in that church, and, without any hypothesis as to the readers, we see from our ch. x. 32 ff., that the persons here addressed had exercised it aforesaid, and from ch. vi. 10, that they still continued to exercise it. Let it then remain, not die out. And it is put first, as being the first of the fruits of faith. The exhortations in ch. iii. 12 f.; x. 24 f.; xii. 12 ff., point the same way). 2, 3.] Brotherly love is now specifically urged in two of its departments, hospitality, and care of prisoners. Forget not hospitality to strangers (so in 1 Pet. v. 9, after recommending earnest love to one another, he proceeds to recommend hospitality. Compare also Rom. xii. 13; and Tit. i. 8; 1 Tim. iii. 2. Bleek remarks, that the notices found in the writings of the enemies of Christianity shew how much this virtue was practised among the early believers): for thereby (by exercising it) some unawares entertained angels (viz. Abraham, Gen. xviii., Lot, Gen. xix. Certainly it would appear at first sight from the former account, that Abraham regarded the "three men" from the first as angels: but the contrary view has nothing against it in the narrative, and was taken by the Jewish expositors. On the motive propounded, Calvin remarks, "If any one objects that this is a rare occurrence, the reply is ready, that not angels alone are received, but Christ Himself, when we receive the poor in His name"). 3.]

Remember them that are in bonds, as if bound with them (compare 1 Cor. xii. 26: as fully sympathizing with them in their captivity): those in distress (a general idea, including captives and any other classes of distressed persons), as also yourselves being in the body (i. e. bound up with a body which has the same capacity of suffering). 4.] Exhortation to chastity. Let your marriage be (held) in honour in all things (see below) and your marriage bed be undefiled: for fornicators and adulterers God shall judge. There are several debatable matters in this verse. First, is it a command or an assertion? The latter view is taken in the ancient Syriac version: "Honourable is marriage among all, and their bed is undefiled:"

also in the A. V. and by some Commentators, Chrysostom included. But the arrangement of the words in the original is against this: and so is the context, in which the whole is of a hortatory character: the very same collocation of words immediately follows in ver. 5, where no one suggests the indicative rendering. The imperative view has accordingly been taken by very many ancient Commentators, and the great mass of moderns. That in all is to be supplied not with "men," but with "things," I have endeavoured to shew in my Greek Test. The latter clause carries with it the anticipation of condemnation in the term shall judge. Man may, or may not, punish them: one thing is sure: they shall come into judgment, and if so into condemnation, when God shall judge all.

5, 6.] St. Paul usually couples with filthy desire, filthy lucre, as both of them incompatible with the kingdom of God: e. g. 1 Cor. v. 10, 11; vi. 9 f.; Eph. v. 3, 5; Col. iii. 5. Let your manner of life be void of avarice: contented (sufficed) with things present: for He (viz. He that promised: compare ch. x. 23, God, already named, ver. 4) hath said, I will not leave thee, no nor will I forsake thee (passages bearing some resemblance to this are found in the Old Test., but nowhere the words themselves: see Josh. i. 5: also, Gen. xxviii. 15; 1 Chron. xxviii. 20; Deut. xxxi. 6, 8. But in Philo we have the same quotation made, and in the very same Greek words. This is certainly singular, and cannot be mere coincidence. Bleek and Lünemann suppose the Writer to have made the citation direct from Philo

[see the Introd. § i., par 156], whereas Delitzsch believes that the expression was taken from Deut. xxxi. 6, and had become invowen into some liturgical or homiletic portion of the services in the Hellenistic synagogue): so that we say ('are in the habit of saying,' 'say always': not, 'can say' nor 'may say,' both which weaken the confidence expressed) with confidence, The Lord (Jehovah in the Psalm, and probably used of the Father, as in other citations in this Epistle, e. g. ch. vii. 21; viii. 8—11; x. 16, 30; xii. 5 al., and without a citation, ch. viii. 2) is my helper [and] (not in Hebrew, I will not be afraid: what shall man do unto me (such is the connexion, both in the Hebrew and here: not, "I will not be afraid what man shall do unto me," as the English Prayer Book, after the vulgate, which is an ungrammatical rendering)?

7.] Remember (may be taken in two ways, as Theophylact says: either "remember to help them in their bodily wants," or, "remember to imitate them." The former meaning would agree with ver. 3: but it is plain from what follows here that the course of these leaders is past, and it is remembering with a view to imitation that is enjoined) your leaders (leaders in the faith) the which (of that kind, who) spoke to you the word of God (the past tense shews that this speaking was over, and numbers these leaders among those in ch. ii. 3: as those who heard the Lord, "by whom the salvation of the Gospel was confirmed to them"), of whom surveying (contemplating, or searching from one end to the other) the termination (by death. It is perhaps to be inferred that these did by martyrdom, as Stephen, James the brother of John, and possibly [but see the matter discussed in Introd. to James] James the brother of the Lord: and possibly too, St. Peter [see Introd. to 1 Pet.] of their conversation (i.e. their Christian behaviour, walk, course. No English word completely gives it), imitate the faith. 8.] Jesus Christ is yesterday and to-day the same, and for ever (the verse stands as a transition from what has passed to what follows. "It was Christ whom these leaders preached, when they spoke the word of God: Christ who supported them to the end, being the author and finisher of their faith; and He remains still the same with regard to you,—the same: be not then carried away &c." As to the meaning of the words, yesterday refers to the time past, when their leaders passed away from them, to-day to the time present, when the Writer and the readers were living. In our A. V., this verse, by the omission of the copula "is," appears as if it were in apposition with "the end of whose conversation:" and in the carelessly printed polyglott of Bagster, the matter is made worse, by a colon being substituted for the period, after 'conversation.' Observe Jesus Christ, not common with our Writer: only e.g. ver. 21, where he wishes to give a solemn fulness to the mention of the Lord: Jesus, the Person, of whom we have been proving, that He is the Christ, the Anointed of God. Compare also ch. x. 10). Be not carried away (the fixed point from which they are not to be carried away, is clearly that given in the last verse, viz. Jesus Christ) by various and strange (strangers to the truth) doctrines (teachings, Matt. xv. 9; Col. ii. 22; 1 Tim. iv. 1): for it is good that the heart be confirmed with grace (God's grace, working on us by faith), not with meats (it is a question whether this be meant of meat eaten after sacrifices, or of "meats" as spoken of so much by St. Paul, meats partaken of or abstained from as a matter of conscience: see 1 Cor. viii. 8, 13: ib. vi. 13: Rom. xiv. 15, 20. The former view is taken by Sellichting, Bleek, Lünemann, &c., on the grounds, 1) that the expression will not suit meats abstained from, only those partaken of: 2) that ver. 10, which is in close connexion with this, speaks of an altar and of partaking of meats sacrificed: and 3) that this same reference, to meats offered in sacrifice, is retained throughout, to ver. 15. The other view is taken by Chrysostom, &c., the great body of later Commentators, and recently by Böhme, Tholuck, and Delitzsch. And I own the reasons urged in its favour incline me strongly to this view, to the exclusion of the other), in which (the observance of which: the word meats being used for the observance of rules concerning meats and drinks, &c.) they who walked were not profited (these, who walked in such observances, are the whole people of God under the Old Test. dispensation [notice the past tenses], to whom they were of themselves useless and profitless, though ordained for a preparatory purpose: so that Calvin's objection is answered, that "the discipline of which the distinction between meats was a part, was useful to the fathers under the law." Yes, and so was the shedding of the blood of bulls and goats part of the discipline: but it was useless to take away sin). 10.] What is the connexion with ver. 9? It is represented as being entirely done away by our interpretation of meats above. If I regard it aright, it is not only not done away, but established in its proper light. Those ancient distinctions are profitless: one distinction remains: that our true meat is not to be partaken of by those who adhere to those old distinctions: that Christianity and Judaism are necessarily and totally distinct. See more below. We have an altar (to what does the Writer allude? Some have said that no distinct idea was before him, but that he merely used the term altar, to help the figure which he was about to introduce. And this view has just so much truth in it, that there is no emphasis on the word altar. The altar bears only a secondary place in the figure; but still I cannot think that it has not a definite meaning. Others understand by the altar, Christ himself. This again has so much truth in it, that the Victim is so superior to the altar, as to cast it altogether into shade; but still is not Himself the altar. Some again understand, the table of the Lord, at which we eat the Lord's Supper. This is so far true, that that table may be said to represent to us the Cross whereupon the Sacrifice was offered, just as the bread and wine, laid on it, represent the oblation itself: but it is not the altar, in any propriety of language, however we may be justified, in common parlance, in so calling it. Some again have interpreted it to mean the heavenly place, where Christ now offers the virtue of His Blood to the Father for us. This again is so far true, that it is the antitype of the Cross, just as the Cross is the antitype of the Lord's table: but we do not want, in this word, the heavenly thing represented by, any more than the enduring ordinance representing, the original historic concrete material altar: we want that altar itself: and that altar is, the Cross, on which the Lord suffered. That is our altar: not to be emphasized, nor exalted into any comparison with the adorable Victim thereon offered; but still our altar, that wherein we glory that for which as for our altars, we contend: of which our banners, our tokens, our adornments, our churches, are full: severed from which, we know not Christ; laid upon which, He is the power of God, and the wisdom of God. And so it is here explained by most of the best Commentators) to eat of which (see esp. 1 Cor. ix. 13) they have not licence who serve the tabernacle (who are these? Some, as Schlichting, Morus, and strange to say recently Hofmann, understand by them the same, viz. Christians, as the subject of we have. We Christians have an altar whereof [even] they who serve the [Christian] tabernacle have no right to eat: i. e. as explained by Hofmann, as the high priest himself did not eat of the sin-offerings whose blood was brought into the tabernacle, but they were burnt without the camp, so we Christians have no sacrifice of which we have any right to eat, no further profit to be derived from that one sacrifice, by which we have been reconciled to God. But this is 1) false in fact. We have a right to eat of our Sacrifice, and are commanded so to do. All that our Lord says of eating His Flesh and drinking His Blood [explain it how we will] would be nullified and set aside by such an interpretation. And 2) it is directly against the whole context, in which the meats, whatever they are, are pronounced profitless, and they who walked in them contrasted with us who have higher privileges. To what purpose then would it be to say, that we have an altar of which we cannot eat? that we have a sacrifice which brings us no profit, but only shame? I pass over the interpretation which understands by the words some particular class of Christians among the Hebrews, because it involves the anachronism of a distinction between clergy and laity which certainly then had no place: and also because it would furnish no sense at all suiting the passage, referring as it then would to some Christians only, not to all. The only true reference of our words, as also that which has been all but universally acknowledged, is that to the Jewish priesthood, and in them to those who have part with them in serving the rites and ordinances of the ceremonial law. These have no right to eat of our altar: for just as the bodies of those beasts whose blood was brought into the sanctuary were burnt without the camp, so Jesus suffered altogether without the gate of legal Judaism. Let us then not tarry serving that tabernacle which has no part in Him, but go forth to Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For we cleave not to any abiding city, such as the earthly Jerusalem, but seek one to come. Let us then not tarry in the Jewish tabernacle, serving their rites, offering their sacrifices; but offer our now only possible sacrifice, that of praise, the fruit of a good confession, acceptable to God through Him. Thus, and thus only, does the whole context stand in harmony. Thus the words in they that serve the tabernacle keep their former meanings: see ch. viii. 5, where we have "such as have the delineation and the shadow of heavenly things:" and remember that "the tabernacle," barely so placed, cannot by any possibility mean any part of the Christian apparatus of worship, nor 11.] For (reason why this exclusion has place: because our great Sacrifice is not one of those in which the servants of the tabernacle had any share, but answers to one which was wholly taken out and burnt: see below) of the animals of which the blood is brought into the holy place by the high priest, of these the bodies are consumed by fire outside the camp (there was a distinction in the sacrifices as to the subsequent participation of certain parts of them by the priests. Those of which they did partake were: 1) the sin-offering of the rulers [a male kid], and the sin-offering of the common people [a female kid or lamb], Lev. iv. 22 ff., 27 ff. [compare the rules in ch. vi. about eating and not eating the sacrifices]: 2) the dove of the poor man, Lev. v. 9: 3) the trespass offering, Lev. vii. 7: 4) the skin of the whole burnt-offering, ib. ver. 8: 5) the wave-breast and heave-shoulder of the peace-offerings: 6) the wave-offerings on the feast of weeks, entire. But those of which they did not partake were 1) the sin-offering of the high priest for himself, Lev. iv. 5—7, esp. ver. 12: 2) the sin-offering for sins of ignorance of the congregation, Lev. iv. 16—21, see Num. xv. 24: 3) the sin-offering for high priest and people combined, on the great day of atonement, the blood of which was brought not only into the holy but into the holiest place, Lev. xvi. 27. Besides which we have a general rule, to which doubtless the Writer here alludes, Lev. vi. 30, "No sin-offering, whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten: it shall be burnt in the fire." As regards particular expressions: the holy place here, as in ch.

ix. 8, 12, 24, 25, and x. 19, probably means not the holy place commonly so called, but the holy of holies, into which the blood of the sin-offering was brought on the day of atonement, and which only typified heaven, whither Christ as High Priest is entered with His Blood. Without the camp refers to the time when Israel was encamped in the wilderness: the enclosure of the camp was afterwards succeeded by the walls of Jerusalem, so that without the gate below answers to it).

12.] Wherefore (as being the antitype of the sin-offering on the day of atonement) Jesus also, that He might sanctify (see on ch. ii. 11) the people (see on ch. ii. 17) through His own blood, suffered outside the gate (of Jerusalem. It is necessary in order to understand this verse rightly, to trace with some care the various steps of the symbolism. The offering of Christ consists of two parts: 1) His offering on earth, which was accomplished on the cross, and answered to the slaying of the legal victim and the destruction of its body by fire, the annihilation of the fleshly life: and 2) His offering in the holy place above, which consisted in His entering heaven, the abode of God, through the veil, that is to say his flesh, and carrying His blood there as a standing atonement for the world's sin. This, the sanctifying of the people through His own blood, was the ulterior end of that sacrifice on earth: and therefore whatever belonged to that sacrifice on earth, is said to have been done in order to that other. This will sufficiently account for the clause indicating purpose here, without making it seem as if the ultimate end, the sanctification of God's people, depended on the subordinate circumstance of Christ's having suffered outside the gate. It did depend on the entire fulfilment by Him of all things written of Him in the law: and of them this was one). So then let us go forth to Him outside the camp ("meaning, outside the polity which is according to the law:" Theodoret. This is certainly intended, and not the meaning given by Chrysostom ["let us take up His cross, and remain outside the world"], nor that of Schlechting, and others ["let us undergo exile, reproach, and the like, with Him"]. Both these may be involved in that which is intended; the latter particular is presently mentioned: but they are not identical with it. Possibly there may be a reference to Exod. xxxiii. 7, "It came to pass, that every one which sought the Lord went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation, which was without the camp." Bleek objects that if so, we should not expect the tabernacle to have been so shortly before mentioned as representing the Jewish sanctuary, in distinction from the Christian. But this seems hardly sufficient reason for denying the reference. The occasion in Exod. xxxiii. was a remarkable one. The people were just quitting Sinai, the home of the law; and the term, "every one which sought the Lord," seems to bear more than ordinary solemnity), bearing His reproach (see on ch. xi. 26).

<sup>14.</sup>] For (reason why such going forth is agreeable to our whole profession: not why the word "camp," and not "city," is used above) we have not here (on earth: not, in the earthly Jerusalem) an abiding city, but we seek for that (abiding city) which is to come ("he calls the city, one to come, because it is future to us. To God, Christ, the angels, it is already present." Schlechting. Yet this is not altogether true. The heavenly Jerusalem, in all her glory, is not yet existing, nor shall be until the number of the elect is accomplished. Then she shall come down out of heaven as a bride prepared for her husband, Rev. xxi. 2. This verse certainly comes with a solemn tone on the reader, considering how short a time the abiding city did actually remain, and how soon the destruction of Jerusalem put an end to the Jewish polity which was supposed to be so enduring).

<sup>15.</sup>] Through Him (placed first, as carrying all the emphasis—through Him, not by means of the Jewish ritual observances) therefore (this gathers its inference from the whole argument, vv. 10—14) let us offer up a sacrifice of praise (this, a sacrifice of praise, is in the Septuagint version. It is the term for a thank-offering in the law. The Commentators quote an old saying of the Rabbis, "In the future age all sacrifices shall cease, but praises shall not cease") continually (not at fixed days and seasons, as the Levitical sacrifices, but all through our lives) to God, that is, the fruit of lips (from Hosea [ref.]: the literal meaning of the Hebrew is, "we will account our lips as calves" [for a sacrifice]: A. V., "we will render the calves of our lips." The fruit of the lips is explained by the next words to be, a good confession to God) confessing to His name (i.e. the name of God, as the ultimate object to which the confession, through Him, Jesus, is referred).

<sup>16.</sup>] But (as if it were said, the fruit of the lips is not the only sacrifice: God must be praised not only with the lips, but with the life) of beneficence and communication (of your means to others who are in want: an usage of the word which, as Bleek remarks, sprung up in the primitive Christian Church, as also the corresponding one of the verb: see on ch. ii. 14) be not forgetful (ver. 2): for with such sacrifices (viz. beneficence and communication, not including ver. 15, which is complete in itself) God is well pleased.

Now he returns to their duty to their leaders. Obey your leaders, and submit (to them) (obey, in the regular course of your habits, guided by them, persuaded that their rule is right: submit, where that rule interferes with your own will: obey has more of free following, submit of dutiful yielding): for they (on their part) keep watch on behalf of your souls (not the same as on behalf of you, but rather equivalent to "on behalf of you for your salvation:" the word soul bringing in the idea of immortality), as having to give an account (by these words, as Theophylact well observes, bestir up the rulers also to diligence, and remembering their own responsibility): that they may do this (viz. watch, not give an account, for thus the present tenses which follow would be inapplicable) with joy, and not lamenting (over your disobedience): for this (their having to lament over you) is unprofitable for you. 18.] Pray for us (here, as elsewhere, it is probably a mistake to suppose that the first person plural indicates the Writer alone. As Delitzsch observes, the passage from the rulers to the Writer individually would be harsh. And when Bleek finds in ver. 19 a proof that the Writer only is meant, he misses the point, that this us, including the Writer and his companions, is in fact a transition note between ver. 17 and ver. 19. See Eph. vi. 19; Rom. xv. 30; 2 Cor. i. 11): for we are persuaded that we have a good conscience, desiring in all things to behave ourselves with seemliness (i. e. to live without giving offence or scandal. This appears to point at some offence of the same kind as we know to have been taken at the life and teaching of St. Paul with reference to the law and Jewish customs). 19.] But I the more abundantly (see on ch. ii. 1) exhort you to do this (i. e. to pray for us), that I may be the sooner restored to you (on the inferences from this and the other notices in this concluding passage, see Introduction.)

20, 21.] Solemn concluding prayer. "He first asks their prayers, then prays for all blessings on them." Chrysostom.

20.] But (breaking off, as we use the same term: see again ver. 22) the God of peace (so often, at the end of St. Paul's Epistles: see Rom. xv. 33; xvi. 20; 1 Cor. xiv. 33; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Phil. iv. 9; 1 Thess. iv. 23; and 2 Thess. iii. 16. In the presence of so many instances of the expression under different circumstances, it would perhaps be hardly safe to infer from it here any reference to danger of strife within the church addressed. Still the words are not a mere formula, and in all the above places, some reference is made, doubtless, to circumstances either of internal dissension or external tribulation. And certainly both the exhortations in vv. 17—19 point to a state in which there was danger of disobedience within and suspicion to-

So that 'peace' was a natural wish for them, even without taking into account those troubles which harassed and threatened them from without, in regard of which it would be also a haven, where they would be), who brought up from the dead (perhaps this is said not of the Resurrection only, but of the Ascension also. "This is the only place where our Writer mentions the Resurrection. Every where else he lifts his eyes from the depth of our Lord's humiliation, passing over all that is intermediate, to the highest point of His exaltation. The connexion here suggests to him once at least to make mention of that which lay between Golgotha and the throne of God, between the altar of the Cross and the heavenly sanctuary, the resurrection of Him who died as our sin-offering") the great Shepherd of the sheep (the passage before the Writer's mind has been that in the prophetic sixty-third chapter of Isaiah [ver. 11], where speaking of Moses, it is said, "Where is He that brought them up out of the sea unto the Shepherd of his flock?" In Isaiah, the shepherd is Moses; and the comparison between Moses and Christ is familiar to our Writer, ch. iii. 2—6. The addition of great as applied to Christ, is correspondent to His title great Priest, ch. x. 21. To deny this reference, with Lünemann, seems impossible, with the remarkable conjunction of "the Shepherd of the sheep." The connexion here in which this title of our Lord is brought in, may be, that the Rulers having been just mentioned, and himself also, and his labours and theirs for the settlement of the Church in peace being before his mind, he is led to speak of Him who is the Chief Shepherd [1 Pet. v. 4], who was brought again from the dead by the God of Peace), in the blood of the everlasting covenant (but in what sense? Theodoret says, "He calls the new Covenant everlasting; for that there shall be none after it." Then, the expression itself can hardly but be a reminiscence of Zech. ix. 11, "By (in) the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoner out of the pit wherein is no water;" and if so, the import of the preposition in here will be at least indicated by its import there. And there it is, by virtue of, in the power of, the blood of thy covenant, i. e. of that blood which was the seal of the covenant entered into with thee. So also we must understand it here. The instrumental, conditioning-element force of in seems to predominate: through, or in virtue of, the blood [Acts xx. 28]. See on the whole, Isa. lv. 3; lxi. 8; John x. 11—18), even our Lord Jesus (here the personal name, Jesus, is joined with the assertion of His lordship over us: below, where the inworking of the Spirit through Him is spoken of, it is "through Jesus Christ," His office as Christ at God's right hand having made Him the channel of the Spirit to us: the anointing on Him, the Head, flowing down to the skirts of the raiment. See Acts ii. 36) perfect you in every good work, towards the doing His will (see ch. x. 36. Here as there, it is not a habit which is spoken of, but the accomplishment of the whole course of obedience), doing in you (doing, chosen expressly as taking up the doing of His will, in exact correspondence with St. Paul's saying, Phil. ii. 13) that which is wellpleasing in His sight, through Jesus Christ (the reference is variously given: to "well-pleasing," — well-pleasing &c. through Jesus Christ: or to the verb, "doing." The latter is by far the more probable, as the former would introduce a superfluity): to whom (i. e. to God, the chief subject of the whole sentence, God, who is the God of peace, who brought up the Lord Jesus from the dead, who can perfect us in every good work, to accomplish His will, and works in us that which is well-pleasing to Him through

CHAP. I. 1.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. James (for all questions who the Author of this Epistle was, see the Introduction. I assume here that which I have there endeavoured to establish, that it is "James the Lord's brother," the first president or bishop of the church at Jerusalem, an Apostle, but not one of the Twelve), servant (not necessarily, as Huther, an official appellation; but implying, as he also confesses, devotion to God and His work alone, irrespectively of self-will or other men's will) of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ (not "of the God and Lord, J. C.," but, as Ecumenius, "by God, he means the Father: by Lord, the Son." Huther remarks, that in all the addresses of Epistles, the whole name Jesus Christ is given. St. James mentions our Lord only here and ch. ii. 1 in this Epistle, and not at all in his speeches in Acts xv. and xxi. Bengel says, "It might have seemed, if he had often named Jesus, as if he did it to exalt himself as the brother of our Lord. For that very reason, he 'knew Christ according to the flesh' less than others"), to the twelve tribes (of Israel: nor can there be any reasonable doubt that this Epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians in the first place. Not however to them, as distinguished from Gentile Christians: for the two classes appear to have been not as yet distinct. If the later date of the Epistle be taken [see Introd.], then the Jewish Christians are addressed as the nucleus and kernel of all Christendom. But to my mind, the former is more probable) which are in the dispersion (the most likely reference of this word is to the literal and actual Jewish dispersion: and the Epistle must be considered as addressed, from the head of the mother church in Jerusalem, to the Jewish believers, residing among the dispersed tribes of Israel), greeting (the formula thus rendered is not found in the address of any other apostolical Epistle; but it occurs in the Epistle drawn up under the direction of James to the Gentile churches in Acts xv. 23).

2—12.] Exhortations regarding the endurance of trials. Think it all joy (the word joy is taken up out of the word rendered greeting, which literally means to rejoice. joyful), my brethren (this is the constant address in our Epistle. It betokens community of origin and of faith), whenever ye fall into various temptations (these are not only what we properly call temptations, but any kind of distresses which happen to us, from without or from within, which in God's purpose serve as trials of us: the latter word being, in this its now common general meaning, a word derived from the Christian life. See 1 Pet. i. 6, which is strictly parallel): <sup>3.]</sup> ground of this joy: knowing (as you do) that the proof of your faith worketh endurance (perseverance: more than patience. But does not St. Paul, Rom. v. 3, 4, state precisely the converse, viz. that "tribulation worketh endurance, and endurance approval?" Doubtless: but it is really the same that is said: tribulation there is equivalent to proof here. As De Wette observes, the thought is not carried to its end as in Romans, but the Apostle breaks away at endurance to exhort respecting it).

<sup>4.]</sup> But (as if it had been said, and be not weary of enduring: but) let endurance have a perfect work (the allusion seems to be to our Lord's saying, Matt. xxiv. 13, "He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved." So that the words are to be taken simply and literally; endurance as the abstract, mere endurance, and work as the work wrought out by endurance in its continuance. And perfect is not to be understood as enduring to the end, but in its ordinary sense of 'perfect,' fully brought out and accomplished), that ye may be perfect (for the work of God in a man is the man. If God's teaching by patience have had a perfect work in you, you are perfect: His is an implanted word, ver. 21. And the purpose of that work is, to make us perfect) and entire (that in which every part is present in its place), deficient in nothing (the subjoining a negative corroboration to a positive clause is characteristic of St. James: compare vv. 5 and 6).

<sup>5.]</sup> But (i. e., but this perfection and entireness, this defect in nothing, will not be yet attained; and you will find, when you aim at it, that you are lacking in the very first requisite) if any of you is deficient in wisdom (for what is meant by wisdom here, see ch. iii. 15—17), let him ask (either supply 'it,' or take the verb absolutely, which is better: so A. V., see below) from God who giveth (asking and giving are put forward as belonging to us and God in the abstract, and we do not want any object, as "it," or "wisdom," supplied) to all men simply (so Rom. xii. 8, "He that imparteth, with simplicity:" which is perhaps better than "with liberality:" we must here interpret by what follows, and understand it of simply giving, and adding nothing afterwards which may take off from the graciousness of the gift) and upbraideth not (in what sense is rather doubtful. Many interpret it of sending away with a refusal: the word will not bear this meaning. By far the greatest part of Commentators understand it of reproaching by the recounting of benefits bestowed. But this again does not reach the full and general nature of the expression here. The real meaning here is just as in Ecclus. xx. 15, "He giveth little, and upbraideth much," and in Ecclus. xli. 22, "After thou hast given, upbraid not," viz. upbraiding with any kind of reproaches, as God might well do, so unworthy are we to approach Him with any request. This of course would include that other), and it shall be given to him (viz. wisdom, see 3 Kings iii. 9—12. The whole verse seems to be written in remembrance of Matt. vii. 7—12).

Huther says well, "Doubt is not unbelief [Luke xxiv. 11], but includes in it the essential character of unbelief: while faith says 'Yes,' and unbelief 'No,' doubt is the union of 'Yes' and 'No,' but so that 'No' is the weightier: it is that inward giving way which leans not to faith, but to unbelief. The deep-lying ground of it is pride"): for he that doubteth is like a wave of the sea (see Eph. iv. 14 and Isa. lvii. 20) driven by the wind and tossed about (the word forms a synonym with the former, "driven by the wind:" and the use of these synonymous expressions so close to one another is again a characteristic of St. James. A good explanation of the figure is quoted by Wiesinger from Heisen: "Sometimes he is cast on the shore of faith and hope, sometimes he is rolled back into the deep of distrust: now he is borne up into the height of worldly pride, now he is mingled with the lowest sands of desperation and trouble"); for (takes up and repeats the former for) let not that man (said with a certain slight expression of contempt) think that he shall receive any thing (viz. of what he asks: some things, as life, food, raiment, &c., he does continually receive) from the Lord (i. e. as usually in this Epistle, from God. So ch. iv. 10, 15; v. 4, 10, 11: see at each of those places. On the other hand, "the Lord," ch. v. 7, 14, 15, is used of Christ. Hofmann remarks that where the Father is not expressly distinguished from the Son by the context, the Godhead, in its unity, is to be understood by the word God: and the same may be said of the Lord).

8.] He is a man with two minds, unstable in all his ways (such is the best way of taking this sentence, making it all predicate and all to apply to that man as its subject. The common way, to take "a double-minded man" as a new subject, as

A. V. 'a double-minded man is unstable,' has this against it, that it makes the very unusual word "doubled-souled," found here and in ch. iv. 8 for the first time in Greek literature, to be a mere usual epithet and word of passage).

9.] The connexion appears to be this: we must not pray before God, we must not be before God, double-minded; in our trials, we shall get no heavenly wisdom, if this is so. This double-mindedness, one soul drawn upwards to God, the other drawn downwards to the world, causes nothing but instability, and cannot result in that joy which is to be our attitude in trial. And it arises from misapprehension of our appointed state in trial: the poor and humble forget the exceeding honour thus done to him, which ought to be to him ground of boasting, far more worthy than (see below) the rich in this world have in their riches which shall so soon fade away: whereas (ver. 12) he that is tried shall receive a crown of life from the Lord. But (contrasted with the double-mindedness above) let the brother (the Christian believer) who is low (poor and afflicted; not merely, low in station: this explanation disappears with the view that the rich man [below] is Christian also) glory in his exaltation (which he has obtained by being admitted into the fellowship of Christ's sufferings, and which he has further in reversion in the glorious crown of life hereafter, ver. 12): but the rich (not the rich brother, nor is the rich to be understood any otherwise than in the rest of the Epistle, compare ch. ii. 6 ff., v. 1 ff. There are difficulties either way; but on mature consideration I find those on the usual hypothesis, of the rich man being also a brother, insuperable. For in that case 1) a most unnatural change in the sense is necessary at "because:"—"Let the rich brother glory in his humiliation, for, or because, considered merely as a rich man, &c.'" So that he is a Christian brother at first, and then a mere rich man in the next clause: 2) such a meaning will not suit the concluding words of ver. 11: which are simply predicated of the rich man, the subject enunciated above, and cannot with any probability be supposed to be said of him merely as regards his riches. Whereas on the other view the difficulties are no more than arise from a confessedly elliptical parallelism. After the rich we must supply glorieth: 'let the low glory in his exaltation, whereas the rich man glories in his debasement,' compare Phil. iii. 19, "whose glory is in their shame" glories (see above) in his humiliation (see Phil. iii. 19, above,—in that which is in reality his debasement, just as in the other case the lowly Christian is called on to boast in what is in reality his exaltation. Thus, and thus only, the parallelism coheres. On the ordinary view, the exaltation of the low brother is, that which is really but not apparently his exaltation, whereas the humiliation of the rich brother is that which is apparently but not really his debasement); because as a flower of the grass he shall pass away. 11.] For (justification of the last words) the sun arose (it is given in the form of a tale, a narration of what happened and ever does happen: see Isa. xl. 7, from which the whole is adapted) with the heat (or, the hot east wind: this interpretation seems approved by the Greek of Jonah iv. 8, where the same word is used for that which we render "a vehement east wind." I prefer the other meaning, the arid scorching which accompanies the increasing power of the sun), and dried up the grass, and the flower thereof fell away (all from Isaiah), and the beauty of its appearance (literally, face, i. e. external appearance) perished: thus also shall the rich man (the same as was spoken of ver. 10) wither (the verb continues the similitude) in his ways (Ps. lxxviii. 24; and Prov. ii. 8). 12.] We now return to the suffering and tempted Christian, who has his blessedness, and a possession more precious and more sure than worldly wealth. Blessed is the man who endureth (the emphasis is on this verb, which distinguishes this saying from that in ver. 2; it is not the mere falling among temptations, but the enduring temptation, which is felicitated) temptation: because when he has become approved (by the trial: when he has undergone the proof, ver. 2) he shall receive the crown of life (of life is genitive of apposition: the crown is life eternal. No image derived from athletes must be thought of in the verse, as is done by many: such an image would be foreign to the ideas of Jews, with whom the receiving a crown from God was a familiar image, irrespective of any previous contest for a prize: see Ps. xxi. 3; Wisd. v. 16, "They shall receive the kingdom of glory and the diadem of beauty from the hand of the Lord"), which He promised to them that love Him (who promised it, is understood: God, repeatedly, in substance: whenever a kingdom is foretold as the future inheritance of His people: to them that love Him, 2 Tim. iv. 8; and the same words again in ch. ii. 5. It is a formula frequently occurring in the law and the prophets: compare Exod. xx. 6;

Let no one when tempted (in the manner hitherto spoken of through the chapter. There is no warrant for changing in the slightest degree the reference of the word. The temptation is a trying of the man by the sollicitation of evil: whether that evil be the terror of external danger, or whatever it be, all temptation by means of it arises not from God, but from ourselves—our own lust. God ordains the temptation, overrules the temptation, but does not tempt, is not the spring of the sollicitation to sin) say that I am tempted from [by] God (by agency proceeding out and coming from God: very different from “of God,” which would represent God as the agent. Thus the man would transfer his own responsibility to God. There does not seem to be any allusion to the fatalism of the Pharisees, as some seem to think: the fault is one of common life, and is alluded to Ecclus. xv. 11, “Say not thou, It is through the Lord that I fell away”): for God is unversed in things evil (the meaning usually given, “untempted,” or “not able to be tempted,” is against the usage of the word. Besides, there is no question here of God being tempted, but of God tempting. It seems that we must take refuge in the ordinary meaning of the word, and render it “unversed in,” having no experience of), but HE tempteth no man: but each man is tempted, being (slightly causal, “in that he is”) drawn out and enticed by (it is the same preposition in the Greek as above, ver. 13: the source rather than the agent: but we cannot here render it from, as the sentence would thus become ambiguous) his own lust (James is not here speaking of the original source of sin in man, but of the actual source of temptation to sin, when it occurs. The “sin” of St. Paul, the sinful principle in man, is not here in question: we take up the matter, so to speak, lower down the stream: and the lust here is the lust there, itself the effect of sin [abstr.] in the members, and leading to sin [concrete] in the conduct): 15.] then lust having conceived, bringeth forth sin: and sin, when completed, bringeth forth death (it has been questioned whether sin is here in one, or in two senses. De Wette holds that the first sin is the purpose, or inner act, of sin,—the completion, carrying this sin out into an act, which act brings forth death, the wages of sin. But this is decidedly wrong. Wiesinger has disputed it, and insisted rightly that the inner act is the union of the will with the lust, the “bringing forth” denoting extrusion into outward act: then the second sin,—which Luther rightly maintains to be the sinful act when brought to perfection in all its consequences, in a series of results following on one another and bringing a man under bondage to his sin,—being thus perfected, brings forth eternal death. The imagery is throughout consistent. The harlot lust draws away and entices the man: the guilty union is committed by the will embracing the temptress: the consequence is that she conceives sin, sin, in general, of some kind, of that kind to which the temptation inclines: then [so literally], the sin, that particular sin, when grown up and mature, herself bringeth forth, as if all along pregnant with it, Death, the final result of sin. So that temptation to sin cannot be from God, while trial is from Him. The one, being our proof, works endurance, and endurance, when she has a perfect work, life: the other, being a bait and excitement arising from lust, “brings forth sin, and sin being completed, brings forth death.” The English reader will not fail to remember Milton’s sublime allegory in Paradise Lost, where Satan, by his own evil lust, brings forth sin: and then by an incestuous union with Sin [which doubtless may be said to lie here also in the background, no cause being assigned for the conception] causes her to bring forth Death).

16—18.] The idea that God tempts to sin has been as yet only negatively contradicted. But so far is it from this being so, that He is the Author of all good. Do not err (some have ended the paragraph with these words: some have begun a new one. But this formula thus used seems invariably to look to what follows), my beloved brethren (both this earnest address, and the caution, shew how important the Writer feels this to be, which he is about to enunciate): every good gift (properly, act of giving) and every perfect gift (properly, thing given). But we cannot express the two by two words in English) descendeth from above (not as A. V., is from above, and descendeth, &c.), from the Father of the lights (of heaven) (it seems now generally agreed that by the lights here is meant the heavenly bodies, and by Father the creator, originator, as in Job xxxviii. 28, “Who is the father of the rain?” Being this, being the Father of those glorious fountains of light, and thus [see below] purer and clearer than they all, it cannot be that He should tempt to evil. Our very life, as renewed in Christ, is of His begetting, and we are a firstfruit of His new world), with (‘chez,’ in the presence of whom) whom there is no change (none of that uncertainty of degree of light which we see in the material heavenly bodies, but which is not in God their Creator) or shadow (a shadow, the dark mark of shadow, the result of being overshadowed, and cast from any object) of turning (arising from turning: from that revolution in which the heavens are ever found: by means of which the moon turns her dark side to us, in a constant state of change, and shadow of turning: by means of which the moon is eclipsed by the shadow of the earth, and the sun by the body of the moon, or, if you will, though this is hardly so likely to have been in view, is hidden from us during the night. From all these God, the Father of lights, is free; as 1 John i. 5, “God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all”).

18.] The greatest example of this position, that all good and perfect gifts come from Him: mentioned not merely as an example, but as leading on to the following context. Because He willed it (the past participle is 1) contemporary with the verb: 2) slightly causal, involving the condition of the act which follows. It was of His own mere will, ‘proprio motu,’ and the emphasis is on this word) begat He (the spiritual birth, not the natural, is meant, as is evident by what follows) us (signifies the Writer and his readers, not Christians in general: not especially as Jewish Christians, for that is not [see below] the reference here) with the word of truth (the genitive is one of apposition; compare John xvii. 17, “Thy word is truth.” And the word of truth is the gospel, preached, and implanted as below: compare 1 Pet. i. 23, “born again . . . by the word of the living God”), that we should be (aim, but not the primary aim, of the begetting. His gracious purpose with regard to us in particular was, that we should be, &c. His great purpose with regard to all Christians is not here in question) a kind of firstfruit (this, a kind of, does not appear to be intended, as Bengel, “to be said in modesty, because properly and absolutely, Christ is the firstfruit.” Rather, I should say, it would point to the early date of our Epistle, in which an idea afterwards so familiar is thus introduced as it were with an apologetic explanation. The figure is from the appointment of the law by which the firstborn of man, of cattle, of fruits, &c., were to be consecrated to God; and the word must be taken with this sacred meaning, not merely as an ordinary word indicating priority. The first Christians, to whom St. James is writing, were as firstborn of the great family, dedicated as firstfruits to God. Weisinger beautifully says, "The thought fully given would be this: they by Regeneration were dedicated as the firstfruits of a sacrificial gift which shall only be completed with the offering up of all creatures") of His creatures (this expression manifestly extends wider than merely to the great multitude of the regenerated whom no man can number; it embraces all creation, which we know shall partake in the ultimate glorious perfection of the sons of God: see Rom. viii. 20, 21. Wiesinger has an important note, shewing from this verse what must be the right understanding of much which follows in this Epistle. "This passage," he says, "is among those which reveal the depth of Christian knowledge in which the practical and moral exhortations of the Writer are grounded: lying as it does expressly ('wherefore,' ver. 21) at the basis of them. We will here bring together in a few words the teaching of the passage, for the sake of its important bearing on the rest of the Epistle. It teaches us 1) as a positive supplement to vv. 14, 15, that the life of man must be renewed, from its very root and foundation: 2) it designates this renewal as God's work, moreover as an imparting of the life of God, as only possible by the working of the Spirit, only on the foundation of the objective fact of our Redemption in Christ, which is the content of the word of truth: 3) it sets forth this re-generation as an act once for all accomplished, and distinguishes it from the gradual penetration and sanctification of the individual life by means of this new principle of life imparted in the re-generation: 4) it declares also expressly that the re-generation is a free act of God's love not induced by any work of man (Eph. ii. 8, 9; Tit. iii. 5), so that man is placed by God in his right relation to God, antecedently to all works well-pleasing to God: for this the expression begat He us involves: and in so far as this begetting necessarily implies the justification of the sinner (to use the language of St. Paul), it is plain also, that St. James cannot, without contradicting himself, make this justification, in the sense of St. Paul, dependent on the works of faith. 5) the word of truth is specified as the objective medium of re-generation: and herewith we must have faith as the appropriating medium on the part of man himself: of the central import of which faith in St. James also we have already seen something (vv. 3, 6), and shall see more (ch. ii. 5, 14 ff.).

6) Together with this act of re-generation proceeding from God, we have also the high destination of the Christian, which the Apostle gives so significantly and deeply in these words, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of His creatures. And that which God has done to him, is now in the following verses made the foundation of that which the Christian has on his part to do: by which that which we said under 3) and 4) receives fresh confirmation. This passage is one to be remembered, when we wish to know what the Apostle understands by the perfect law (i. 25, ii. 12), and what he means, when (ii. 14 ff.) he deduces justification from the works of faith. As regards the dogmatical use, which some make of this passage, wishing to shew that regeneration is brought about by the word, as distinguished from the Sacrament of Baptism (Tit. iii. 5—7), we may remark, that seeing that the word of truth designates the gospel, as a whole, without any respect to such distinction, nothing regarding it can be gathered from this passage. The word of the Lord constitutes, we know, the force of the Sacrament also. And is it meant to be inferred that the readers of this Epistle were not baptized!")

the latter to wrath and suddenness of temper, so often found in the wake of swift rejoinder and ready chattering. (Ecumenius reminds us that a certain divine man says, He that talketh repenteth often, he that holdeth his peace never), slow to wrath (the reference is general, as the precept is. The quick speaker is the quick kindler):

20.] for the wrath (any wrath, all wrath) of man worketh not ('practiseth not,' 'worketh not habitually') the righteousness of God (that which is righteousness in God's sight. We must not interpret the righteousness of God the state of righteousness before God, as some, or that righteousness in another, into which God begets men by his word of truth, as Hofmann and Wiesinger. When this latter asks, What relevance here has the remark that anger doeth not that which is right in the sight of God?—an easy answer can be given. Be not immoderately zealous, hastily rash to speak and to be angered, even in God's behalf [for this is implied]: be humble, ready to listen:—for your angry zeal, your quick speaking, work not God's righteous purposes—serve not Him, are not carriers forward of that righteousness which is the characteristic of His kingdom, ch. iii. 18. How many an endeavour, which might have ended in working the righteousness of God, has been diverted and blighted by hasty speaking and anger, and ended only in disgracing ourselves, and Him whom we would have served, before men!).

21.] Wherefore (consequence from ver. 20: seeing that wrath excludes you from having a share in the righteous work of God) putting off (it must be done as a single act, antecedently to that which follows. The previous putting off is the condition of the subsequent reception) all filthiness (here figurative, as Rev. xxii. 11. Some Commentators take it here as standing alone: others join it with and superabundance, as belonging to the genitive "of malignity;" and this seems better for the context, which concerns not the putting away of moral pollution of all kinds, but only of that kind which belongs to malignity: see below. And, thus taken, it will mean that malignity pollutes the soul, and renders it unfit to receive the implanted word. It is very possible that the agricultural similitude in the word implanted may have influenced the choice of both these words, filthiness and superabundance. The ground must be ridged of all that pollutes and chokes it, before the seed can sink in and come to maturity; must be cleaned and cleared) and abundance ('superfluity' is perhaps too strong: it is, if the above figure be allowed, the rank growth, the abundant crop) of malignity (evil disposition towards one another. The word carries on the "wrath" above: which springs from malignity, evil disposition, which is inherent in our hearts, and requires putting off before we can receive the word of God. That this is so, is evident from the recommendation of mildness which follows. However the exhortation may apply in the wider sense, it is not its sense here, as the context plainly shews), in mildness (towards one another) receive (so Mark iv. 20, of the good ground) the implanted word (the word spoken of is beyond doubt the same as the word of truth above—i.e. the Gospel, in its fulness. But the epithet makes some little difficulty. First of all, it clearly is not, as Ecumenius seems to take it, 'inmate:' for this would stultify the command to receive it, we having it already. Nor can it mean "the word which has been planted in the whole of Christendom," seeing that individuals are here being dealt with: but the allusion is apparently to the parable of the sower, and it is the word implanted [equivalent to which has been sown], the word whose attribute and virtue is to be implanted, and which is implanted, awaiting your reception of it to spring up and take up your being into it and make you new plants) which is able to save your souls liberty ("the perfect law," not, the gospel as contrasted with the law, nor the covenant of faith as more perfect than that of legal obedience: but the rule of life as revealed in the gospel, which is perfect and perfecting, but not in contrast with the former law as being not perfect, and not able to make perfect: that distinction is not in view here: see below. The whole Epistle is founded on this perfect law of Christ, more especially on that declaration of it contained in the Sermon on the mount: see Introd. And that this law here is meant, the implanted word, the word of truth, as it is a rule of conduct, is evident from what follows, where deeds, and they only, are spoken of. It is the law of our liberty, not as in contrast with a former law of bondage, but as viewed on the side of its being the law of the new life and birth, with all its spontaneous and free development of obedience. Huther remarks, "Ever in the Old Test. the sweetness of the law was subject of praise [Ps. xix. 8-11], but the life-giving power belonged to the law only in an imperfect manner, because the covenant on which it rested, was as yet only one of promise, and not of fulfilment"), and remains there (remains looking in, does not depart as the other. As Wiesinger remarks, the matter spoken of here is not so much observing the law in act, as observing it in attention—not letting it pass out of the thoughts. That leads to action, as below), being (not, having become: see above on ver. 22) not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of work (not, of the work, but abstract, of work, something which brings a result with it), this man shall be blessed in his doing (the words imply that even in the act there is blessing: the life of obedience is the element wherein the blessedness is found and consists).

26, 27.] The Apostle is still on the command in ver. 19. As yet he has been exemplifying the being swift to hear, in connexion with the slow to wrath. From this he passes to that which is again so nearly connected with it, —the being slow to speak. If any man imagines that he is (our A. V. 'seem to be' is ambiguous: it may mean 'to others,' whereas the word really means only, 'to himself': 'thinks that he is') religious (in the sense of 'observant of God's outward service,' marking the external manifestation of a religious mind. We have no word at all adequately expressing the original term), not bridling his tongue, but deceiving his heart (see above on "deceiving yourselves," ver. 22: viz., by imagining such a character consistent with true religion), of this man the religious service is vain (idle and fruitless). Religious service pure and unpolluted (the two adjectives seem merely to bring out the positive and negative sides of purity, as in the two acts described below) in the estimation of (Rom. ii. 13; Gal. iii. 11) Him who is our God and Father (or, according as the original is read, "(our) God and Father." That the paternal relation here ascribed to God must be understood as referring to us, is evident) is (consists in) this, To visit orphans (perhaps in reference to the appellation "Father," which has preceded: so Ps. lxxviii. 5, God is called "father of the fatherless, and judge of the widows") and widows in their affliction (shews at the same time the reason for the visit, and

These uncoupled clauses are found in our Epistle especially, where various particulars are enumerated which go to make up a whole, or apply to the description of one thing: as e. g., ver. 19; ch. iii. 6: see also ch. v. 5, 6) preserve himself unspotted from the world (not merely earthly things as far as they tempt to sin: still less the natural evil disposition of men; but, as in ch. iv. 4, the whole earthly creation, separated from God, and lying in sin, which, whether considered as consisting in the men who serve it, or the enticements which it holds out to evil lusts, is to Christians a source of continual defilement. They, by their new birth under God, are taken out of the world; but at the same time, by sin still dwelling in them, are ever liable to be enticed and polluted by it: and therefore must keep themselves [1 Tim. vi. 14], for fear of such pollution. This keeping is indeed in the higher sense God's work: John xvii. 15; but it is also our work, 1 Tim. v. 22).

CHAP. II. 1—13.] THE SIN OF RESPECT OF PERSONS: as the first of a series of reproofs for errors in practice which spring out of the mention of the "perfect law of liberty:" compare ch. i. 25, and ver. 12. The Apostle begins, as is his wont, with strong blame of the sin: then illustrates it vv. 2—4: then gives the ground of its sinfulness vv. 5—11, and concludes vv. 12, 13 with a reference again to the law of liberty.

1—4.] The warning and its practical ground. My brethren, do not in respectings of persons ('in,' i. e. in the practice of, in the midst of. The substantive in the original is plural, to point out the various kinds and occasions of the fault. The fault itself, as here intended, is easily explained by the context, where an example is taken of one kind of it. Theile says well, that it is the fault of measuring individual Christians not by their Christian graces, but by their fortune, and external qualities.—and of preferring some to others according to this standard) hold the faith (not merely 'faith in,' but the faith of, thus setting before them more forcibly the utter inconsistency of such respect of persons with the service of Christ) of our Lord Jesus Christ, [the Lord] of glory (these words [the Lord] do not exist in the original. See the question, what is to be supplied, discussed in my Greek Test.).

2, 3, 4.] Hypothetical example, to explain to them that to which he especially points. The hypothesis carries however in itself a foundation of fact, and appeals to the consciences of the readers whether it were not so. For (as if it were said, "that which I mean, is") if there chance to have come (the entrance is accomplished when that which is alleged takes place) into your assembly (the word in the original is synagogue: but from this some have too hastily inferred from the word that the Jewish synagogue is meant. This, in the face of the organization of the church implied in ch. v. 14, would be impossible. The word may well be understood of a Christian assembly, or as merely an assembly in general. But it is most likely here, from the allusions to sitting and standing below, a place of Christian worship, the name being a natural one, considering by whom the Epistle was written, and to whom it was addressed) a man with gold rings (we have evidence of the practice of overloading the fingers with rings. Martial speaks of a certain Charinus, who wore six rings on each finger, and never took them off, not even at night, nor in the bath: and Lucian mentions sixteen heavy rings being worn on the fingers at once), in a splendid garment (glittering, either in colour, or with ornaments), and there have come in also a poor man in a vile garment;

The question, argued at considerable length by Wiesinger and Huther, who these in-comers are supposed to be, whether Christians, or Jews who have looked in as strangers, is perhaps hardly worth the trouble spent upon it. The illustration merely requires that they should be strangers, not having a regular place in the congregation. Certainly so far I agree with Huther, that there appears nothing in the text which compels us to assume them to be Christians. They are taken merely as samples of a class, the rich and the poor; and these two are dealt with again in vv. 5 ff., as classes of persons, out of one of which God hath chosen His people for the most part, and out of the other of which the oppressors of His people arise. So that it is better to leave the examples in their general reference), <sup>4.</sup> (now comes the application, in the form of a question): did ye not (in the case supposed) doubt (such is the constant sense of the word here used, throughout the New Test. And here the sense seems very good: “Did ye not, in making such distinction between rich and poor, become of the number of those who doubt respecting their faith, ch. i. 6? Your faith abolishes such distinction: you set it up in practice. You are not then whole in that faith.” See the other explanations discussed in my (Greek Test.) within yourselves (in your own minds, being at issue with your own faith), and become judges (in the case of the rich and poor; judges of the case before you), of evil thoughts (the genitive is one of quality. The evil thoughts are in the judges themselves, and consist in the undue preference given by them to the rich. The same blame, of being a judge when a man ought to be an obeyer of the law, is found in ch. iv. 11)? <sup>5.</sup> Listen, my beloved brethren (bespeaking attention to that which follows, as shewing them in a marked manner the sin of their respecting of persons), Did not God choose out (in His proceeding, namely, in the promulgation of the Gospel by Christ, Matt. v. 3 ff.; Luke vi. 20. See also 1 Cor. i. 27) the poor (as a class, set against the rich as a class, below) as regards the world (or, those who in the world’s estimation are accounted poor; but the other is most likely here) rich in faith (i. e. to be rich in faith, or so that they are rich in faith. In faith, as the element, the world, so to speak, in which they pass for rich, as in 1 Tim. i. 2: not as the material of which their riches consist, as in Eph. ii. 4. Wiesinger well says, “Not the measure of faith, in virtue of which one man is richer than another, is before the Writer’s mind, but the substance of the faith, by virtue of which substance every believer is rich. The riches are the treasures of salvation, and especially, owing to the following word heirs, the sonship in God’s family”), and heirs of the kingdom which He promised (Luke xii. 31, 32, &c.) to them that love Him?

6.] Contrast to God's estimate of the poor. But ye dishonoured the poor man (in the case just now put. "It is improper to debase those whom God extols, and to treat contumeliously those whom He counts worthy of honour. But God honours the poor: therefore he inverts God's order, who rejects them." Calvin. This is his first argument. Now, vv. 6, 7, he brings in another, deduced from the conduct of rich men towards Christians, and towards Christ Himself). Do not the rich (opposed as a class, to the poor above. This serves to show that "the rich man," when generally spoken of in the Epistle, as e.g. ch. i. 10, is not the Christian rich man, but the rich man as such, in his worldliness and enmity to God) oppress you (literally, use power, or lordship, or licence, against you to your hurt), and is it not they that drag you (the term implies violence) to courts of judgment (see ch. v. 6. The words may refer either to persecutions, or to oppressive law-suits; or perhaps to both. See on the matter, 1 Cor. vi. 2. 1)?

7.] Is it not they that blaspheme (actually and literally, in words, it being, as we have maintained throughout, ungodly and heathens who are pointed at. Those who maintain them to be Christian rich men, would understand this blasphemy of disgracing by their lives) the goodly name which was called on you (i.e. which when you were admitted into Christ's Church by baptism was made yours, so that you are called Christ's, 1 Cor. iii. 23 [not necessarily "Christians:" no particular form of the appropriation of the name is alluded to, but only the fact of the name being called over them. The appellation may or may not have been in use at this time, for aught that this shews]. The name is of course that of Christ: not that of God, as some think, nor that of 'brethren,' as others)! So that if ye thus dishonour the poor in comparison with the rich, you are 1) contravening the standard of honour which God sets up in His dealings: 2) opposing your own interest: 3) helping to blaspheme the name of Christ.

8—11.] Proof that this behaviour is a transgression of God's law. The connexion is somewhat recondite. The adversative yet clearly takes exception at something, expressed or understood. Calvin and others suppose the Apostle to be meeting an objection of his readers:—"But thus, according to you, we should be breaking the injunction, Love thy neighbour, &c., for we should view the rich with hatred and contempt." Then he replies, "Certainly, if ye, &c. ye do well:" understanding ye do well as a very feeble approbation. But this seems to me very unnatural. It contains indeed the germ of the true view, which appears to be this: The Apostle is not replying to a fancied objection on the part of others, but is guarding his own argument from misconstruction: "All this is true of the rich. Still I do not say, hate them, drive them from your assemblies, &c.: if you choose to observe faithfully the great command, Love others as yourselves, in your conduct to all, well and good: but respect of persons, instead of being a keeping, is a breach of this law; for I have proved it to be sin, and he who commits sin is a transgressor of the law, of the whole law, by the very terms of legal obedience." Thus the context seems to run smoothly and naturally. Yet (for the connexion see above) if ye fulfil (if ye really choose to fulfil in its completeness that law) the royal law (the law which is the king of all laws, as the old saying makes law itself king of all.

Love fulfils the whole law, Rom. xiii. 10), according to the Scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well (i. e. well and good; see above: if you choose to do this, I have nothing to object. But then, this you can never do, as long as you respect persons):

9.] but if ye respect persons, it is sin that ye are working (not obedience to this royal law); being (i. e. seeing that ye are) convicted by the law as transgressors (viz. by virtue of what I have already proved as wrong in your conduct. "For God commands us to love our neighbours, not to respect persons," Calvin). 10.] The fact of transgression of this law is proved by its solidarity, not admitting of being broken in one point, and yet kept in the whole. "God," says Calvin, "will not be served with reservations, so that we might except from this law what happens not to please us." For whosoever shall have kept the whole law, but shall have offended (literally, stumbled) in (the matter of: as in ch. iii. 2: see there) one thing (one thing enjoined, one commandment, as by and by explained), has become guilty of (brought into the condemning power of, involved in) all (things mentioned as objects of prohibition—for such is the reference here, see below—in the law).

11.] Reason for this assertion: the unity of the divine Author of the whole law, and of that law, as the exponent of His will: "He is one who made the whole law: those who violate His will in one thing, violate it all." Bengel. For He who said, Commit not adultery, said also, Commit not murder. Now if thou committest no adultery, but committest murder, thou hast become a transgressor of the law. Various fanciful reasons have been given for the selection of these two commandments: 'because these two were punished with death,' Baumgarten: 'because no one had laid a charge of adultery against the readers, but the other they violated by violating the law of love,' Wiesinger. But it is far more likely that they are alleged as the two first which regard our duty to our neighbour generally: the prohibition of adultery being put first, as in Mark x. 19; Luke xviii. 20; Rom. xiii. 9; Philo also has this order, and lays a stress on it, as shewing that adultery is the greatest of social crimes. So that this order must have been one preserved in ancient tradition: or perhaps found anciently in the Septuagint. The Rabbis have the same sentiment as this. They say of the thirty-nine precepts of Moses, "If a man do them all, but omit one, he is guilty of all and every of them."

12, 13.] Concluding and summary exhortations, to speak and act as subject to the law of liberty and love. So speak, and so do (so both times does not regard what has gone before, but what follows. Speaking had been before hinted at in ch. i. 19: and will come again under consideration in ch. iii.), as being about to be judged by (by means of, as the measure by which your lives will be estimated) the law of liberty (the same as in ch. i. 25: that perfect expansion of God's will, resting on the free unrestrained principle of love, which is the moral code of the Gospel. And the point of the exhortation is, "So do good, as not constrained by the law, but free agents").

<sup>13.</sup> Reason why we should be careful thus to speak and do: viz. that if we do not, we cast ourselves out of that merciful judgment at God's hands which is promised to the merciful: Matt. v. 7, "Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy;" which is the key to our verse. For the judgment (which is coming) (shall be) unmerciful to him who wrought not (the past tense is anticipatory, the Writer standing at the day of the judgment and looking back over life) mercy: mercy boasteth over judgment (without a copula, the sentence is introduced more emphatically and strikingly. The meaning is, the judgment which would condemn any and all of us, is, in the case of the merciful, overpowered by the blessed effect of mercy, and mercy prevails over it. The saying is abstract: to turn it into a concrete, 'the merciful man,' or to appropriate the mercy, 'the mercy of God,' is to limit that which is purposely and weightily left unlimited, as an universal truth).

<sup>14—26.</sup> In close connexion with what has gone before, the Apostle sets forth that bare faith without works can never save a man. The following remarks of De Wette on the passage are important, and well condensed. They have been impugned by many, among whom are Neander, Schneckenburger, Thiele, Thiersch, Hofmann: but they seem to me best to represent the simple and honest view of the matter, without any finessing to make the two Apostles in exact accord in their meaning of terms and their positions respecting them. "In order rightly to understand this polemical passage, it is necessary accurately to define St. James's ideas of faith, of works, and of justification, and to compare them with those of St. Paul. Faith is, according to St. James, the result of the reception of the Word (ch. i. 22), especially in a moral point of view: moral conviction (Rom. xiv. 23): and although he recognizes it also as belief in Christ (ch. ii. 1), as trust (i. 6; v. 15), and truth (i. 3), yet he makes these particulars here of so little moment, that he regards it as theoretical belief only, and ascribes it to the evil spirits (ii. 19). Widely different from this is St. Paul's idea of faith, which presupposes self-abasement, the feeling of unworthiness and incapability (Rom. iii. 9 ff., 23), and consists in trust on the grace of God revealed in the atoning death of Christ (Rom. iii. 23; v. 8; 2 Cor. v. 18 f.). Of this faith, moral faith is a branch (Rom. xiv. 23): but this latter, which is the adoption of the working principle of love (Gal. v. 6), can only spring from the purification of the inner man by faith in the atonement. So that it is impossible to say, as some have done, that the idea of faith in the two Apostles is the same. Works, according to St. James, are not the works of the law in the lower sense, the mere observance of carnal ordinances and usages, — but an active life of practical morality, the rule of which is indeed found in the Mosaic law, and especially in the command to love one another, but so found, as apprehended, and appropriated by the spirit of liberty (see ch. i. 25; ii. 12). St. Paul also understands by 'the works of the law' not merely ceremonial observances, as plainly appears from Rom. vii. 14 ff.: but when he contends against the Jewish righteousness by works, and their pride, as in Rom. ix. 30 ff., he includes these observances in that to which he refers. As regards justification, St. James understands it in a proper, or moral sense (compare Matt. xii. 37), which St. Paul also recognizes. But in the latter Apostle's idea of justification, we must distinguish a threefold point of view: 1) the general moral, at which he stops, Rom. ii. 13 (compare ib. ver. 5 ff.), taking no account, how the highest aim of morality, there indicated, is to be attained, and is attained: 2) In his polemical point of view, as combating Jewish righteousness by works, he denies that we can, by the fulfilment of the law (even of its moral part, seeing that no man fulfils it aright), attain justification or well-pleasingness to God (Rom. iii. 20; Gal. ii. 16). 3) In the third point of view also, in the Christian life itself, St. Paul recognizes the inadequacy of a good conscience to give peace and blessedness to men (1 Cor. iv. 1), and finds peace only in faith in God, who justifies him of His free grace, i. e. so looks on and accepts him, as if he were righteous. This higher kind of justification, St. James does not recognize." The whole question of fact, as to whether St. Paul's teaching, or some misunderstanding of it, or neither the one nor the other, was in St. James's view here, I have discussed in the Introduction, § iii. 5 ff. 14.] What is the profit (arising from that to be mentioned: the resulting profit), my brethren, if any man say (there is no emphasis on the word say, as many have supposed: the whole argument proceeds on the hypothesis of his possessing faith: and in ver. 19, faith is actually ascribed to him. At the same time it is not to be wholly passed over, that the Apostle has written not "have faith," but "say he hath faith." While this does not imply any want of genuineness in the faith, it perhaps slightly distinguishes the possession of such faith from the absolute having faith: or, perhaps belongs to the dramatic form of the hypothesis, in which the man is introduced boasting of and appealing to his faith) that he has faith, but have not works (i. e. those acts in his life which are proofs and fruits of faith: not mere ceremonial works: see De Wette's remarks cited above)? (a note of interrogation, not a comma, is to be placed here. The sentence contains two distinct but connected questions: "What is the profit, if &c.?" and, "Can &c.?" can (his) faith save him (him is noticeable, as confining the question within the limits of the hypothesis, by making this particular man, who has faith and not works, the object of the question, and not any, or every man. Here lies the true key to the nullity of the faith in question)?

15, 16.] The quality, and unprofitableness, of such faith shewn, as in vv. 2, 3, by a familiar example. But (so literally. It takes up the argument against the person supposed, or against his supporters. It is best rendered in English by beginning the sentence abruptly, not giving any word for it) if a brother or a sister (the case of a Christian brother or sister is supposed, to bring out more strongly the obligation to help, as a duty) be (found, on your access to them) naked (there is no need to interpret the word badly clothed, as so many Commentators: extreme destitution, and nakedness in the literal, or almost literal sense, might well go together) and destitute of daily food, and (literally, but: bringing in the slight contrast between the want and the manner of its supply) some one from among you (not, as Grotius, of you, "who believe faith to suffice for salvation," but generally; and put in this form to bring the inference nearer home to themselves) say ('shall have said'), Go in peace (see Judg. xviii. 6; 2 Sam. xv. 9. The words would imply, that the wants were satisfied), be warmed (as being naked) and filled; but ye (enlarging the former "one of you," and now applying the hypothesis to all) give them not (have not given them) the necessities of the body; what is the profit?

17.] Application of the similitude. So also faith, if it have not (be not accompanied by as its proper result. Here, again, the quasi-identification of the faith with the man, and ascription of the works to it as a possession, shew in what relative places the two stand in the Apostle's estimate) works, is dead in itself (not as A. 18.] But (in any case of faith without works, analogous to that supposed above, of one of you having dismissed the naked and hungry with mere words) some one will say (he will be liable to this reproach from any one who takes the more effectual and sensible method, of uniting faith with works), Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me (not, 'prove to me,' but 'exhibit to me') thy faith without the works (which ought to accompany it), and I will shew thee my faith by (from the evidence of, out of, as the ground of the manifestation) my works. The whole difficulty found in this verse by Commentators has arisen from overlooking the fact that it continues the argument from the previous verses, and does not begin a new portion of the subject. And the reason why this has been overlooked, is, the occurrence between the two of the general clause in ver. 17. The same mistaken person is in the Apostle's view throughout, down to ver. 22: and it is as addressed to him, on the part of a chance objector to his inconsistency, that this saying is introduced: the but conveying the opposition of an objection not to the Apostle himself, but to him whom the Apostle is opposing. 19.] Still addressed to the same advocate of faith only, but now directly, and not in the person of the speaker just introduced. This is better than to suppose this last still speaking; on account of the length of argumentation before, the second person singular is dropped, and the analogy of the two arguments drawn from Abraham and Rahab, both of which most naturally come, as the latter on any view does, from the Apostle himself. Thou believest (better without an interrogation: see John xvi. 31, note) that God is one

(or, 'that there is one God.' The Apostle selects, from all points of dogmatic belief, that one which stands at the head of the creed of Jews and Christians alike. Compare especially Deut. vi. 4; Neh. ix. 6; Mark xii. 29, 32; Rom. iii. 30; 1 Cor. viii. 4, 6; ch. iv. 12); thou doest well (i. e. 'so far is well: ' it is a good faith, as far as it goes'): the devils also (not, the dæmoniacks, nor dæmons in the possessed, who trembled at the sacred Name: but simply, as usually, the evil spirits) believe (the verb is purposely used absolutely: not merely, 'believe this truth,' but, 'thus far, are believers in common with thyself'), and shudder (the word is used properly of the hair standing on end with terror. Their belief does nothing for them but certify to them their own misery. "This particular, inserted beyond the expectation of the reader, has immense force." Bengel).

20—23.] Proof of the uselessness of faith without works, from the example of Abraham; introduced by a severe and triumphant appeal to the objector. But (passing on to another example which is to prove it even more certainly) wilt thou know (the use of wilt thou, dost thou, consent to, know, serves to shew that the knowledge itself is plain and palpable, and the resisting it can only arise from perversity), O empty (void of knowledge and seriousness: content with a dead and bootless notion) man (so in Rom. ix. 20), that faith (here abstract: all faith, faith by itself: not merely faith, in any supposed case) separate from works (here again, abstract: and therefore, in subordination to the former abstract noun, the works which belong to it, which might be expected from it) is idle (bootless, without result?).

No other meaning will satisfy the connexion, inevitable to any intelligent reader, between this justification and the salvation of ver. 14: which again is connected with the "being about to be judged" of ver. 12. evident, how faith wrought with his works. By the Apostle's own comparison, ver. 26, faith is the body, obedience the spirit: faith without obedience is dead, until obedience, the spirit, sets faith in motion: then faith, like the limbs of the body, moves with and works with the acts of obedience. Which is prior in time, which the ground of the other, is a point not touched by St. James at all); and the scripture was fulfilled which saith, But Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness (i. e. that saying of Scripture which long preceded the offering of Isaac, received its realization, not, it may be, its only realization, but certainly its chief one, in this act of obedience. It was not, until this, fulfilled, in the sense of being entirely exemplified and filled up. Wiesinger combats this sense as an unworthy one: no such objection as that which he brings [viz. that we make thus the truth of God's saying depend on Abraham's subsequent conduct] lies against our view, that the saying received on, and not till this occasion, its entire and full realization. It was true, when uttered: but it became more and more gloriously true of Abraham's life and acts till it reached this its culminating point, in his chief act of self-denying obedience): and he was called (couple with was fulfilled, not with was reckoned) God's friend (i. e. And in Isa. xli. 8 the words "the seed of Abraham whom I loved" are rendered by the Vulgate and by the A. V. 'the seed of Abraham my friend.' (accounted righteous before God, as above), and not by (from) faith only (notice only: St. James never says that a man is not justified by faith, provided that faith include in it the condition of obedience: but by faith only, without works, is no man justified).

<sup>25</sup>] The example of Rahab. Various reasons have been assigned for this example being added. See the whole matter discussed in the Introduction, § 3. And in like manner (with Abraham) was not Rahab the harlot (to be taken literally: see on Heb. xi. 31) justified by works, when she received the messengers (spies, Heb. xi. 31), and thrust them forth (in haste and fear, Josh. ii. 15, 16: the term is not simply sent them forth) by another way (viz. through the window, Josh. ii. 15)? <sup>26</sup>]

General conclusion to the argument, but in the form of a comparison, as in ver. 17. For (for binds the verse on to the foregoing, and makes it rather depend on this axiom, than this axiom a conclusion from it: 'it must be so, Rahab must have been thus justified, seeing that . . .') just as the body without (separate from) spirit (or, the spirit) is dead, so also faith without works (or without its works, the works belonging to it: as in ver. 20) is dead. This comparison has been found matter of surprise to some Commentators, inasmuch as the things compared do not seem relatively to correspond. Faith is unquestionably a thing spiritual: works are external and material: so that it would seem as if the members of the comparison should have been inverted, and works made the body, faith the spirit. But the Apostle's view seems rather to be this: Faith is the body, the sum and substance, of the Christian life: works (obedience), the moving and quickening of that body; just as the spirit is the moving and quickening principle of the natural body. So that as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is also dead.

CHAP. III. a) 1—12.] The danger, as connected with the upholding of faith without works, of eagerness to teach: and, by occasion, the manifold and irrepressible sins of the tongue. Then follows, b) 13—18.] an exhortation, to prove a man's wisdom by mildness, not by a contentious spirit.

1.] The more the idea prevailed, that faith, without corresponding obedience, was all that is needful, the more men would eagerly press forward to teach: as indeed the Church has found in all ages when such an opinion has become prevalent: for then teachers and preachers of their own appointing have rapidly multiplied. Be not ('become not': let not that state of things prevail among you, in which you become) many teachers (not, as A. V., 'masters,' which conveys a wrong idea: but teachers, persons imparting knowledge in the congregation. This in the primitive times might be done by all in turn, as we know from 1 Cor. xiv. 26—33: and St. James exhorts against the too eager and too general assumption of this privilege), my brethren, knowing (as ye do: or, as ye ought to do: it is a good remark of Huther's, that knowing, being closely joined to the imperative, is itself hortatory: 'knowing, as ye might know') that we (i. e. as many of us as are teachers) shall receive greater condemnation (than others who are not teachers. This being so, it has surprised some Commentators, that the Apostle includes himself with those whom he is dissuading: but the solution is easy,—viz. that he includes himself out of humility, and obviously on the assumption that the office of teacher is not faithfully performed. The sense might be thus filled up, as, indeed, it is virtually offend all. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body. 3 Behold, we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us; and we turn about their whole body. 4 Behold also the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor listeth. 5 Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things. filled up in ver. 2: "be not many teachers, for in such office there is great danger of failing, and if we teachers fail, our condemnation will be greater").

2.] For (see above: this supplies the ellipsis) oftentimes we all (without exception: the original word implies this) offend (to be taken in the widest moral sense, as an axiom applying to our whole conduct. It is in the next clause limited to the subject in hand, viz. the tongue). If any man offendeth not in word (in speaking: and therefore the hypothesis is applicable to these many who set up for teachers, seeing that thus their chances of offence would be multiplied many fold), he [is] a perfect man (explained by what follows), able to bridle the whole body also (the sense runs thus: We all oftentimes offend: and of those frequent offences, sins of the tongue are so weighty a part and so constant a cause, that he who is free from them may be said to be perfect, inasmuch as he is able to rule every other minor cause of offence: 'the whole body' standing for all those other members by which, as by the tongue, sin may be committed: which may be instruments of unrighteousness for sin, or, instruments of righteousness for God, Rom. vi. 13).

4: 3) with a small fire burning a great forest, vv. 5, 6.

3.] This mention of bridling, and the situation of the tongue where the bridle also is placed, introduce this similitude: bridle and mouth being ideas already given by the context. But (transitional) if (as we do: in our vernacular, 'when,' 'as often as') in the mouths of horses we put bits (literally, the bits: i.e. which are in common use: the bits, of which every one knows), in order to their obeying us (thus shewing, by the expression of this purpose, that we recognize the principle of turning the whole body by the tongue,—now comes the result after the if: see below); we turn about also (in turning the bit one way or the other) their whole body.

4.] The second comparison takes up, not the supposition with its "if," but only the result foregoing. Behold even (or also) the ships, though so great, and driven by fierce winds (Bede interprets this as having a meaning respecting ourselves, the winds being the appetites and passions. But it is not likely that the Apostle had any such meaning), are turned about by a very small rudder, whithersoever the desire of the steersman (him who actually handles the tiller) may wish.

5.] Application of the comparison. Thus also the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things (vaunts great words, which bring about great acts of mischief). Behold (rendering the sentence literally:—for the purpose of an English version, it must be inverted), how small a fire kindleth how great a forest (the word also sometimes signifies "matter," and thus the A. V. But the ordinary meaning, forest, gives a far livelier and more graphic sense here)!

6.] Likewise the tongue is a fire, that world of iniquity (a complete repertory of all wickedness, as the world is of all things): the tongue is (literally, is constituted: but meaning no more than that it is) among our members, that one which defileth the whole body (thus justifying the title given to it of "that world of iniquity"), and setteth on fire (the other clause, the tongue is a fire, is now taken up) the orb (or, wheel) of the creation (in interpreting these difficult words, one thing must especially be borne in mind: that, like the whole body, they designate some material thing which agreeably to the figure used may be set on fire. This would at once set aside all figurative explanations. See the proposed meanings discussed in my Greek Test. The sense, the whole orb or cycle of creation, is that which I have seen cause to adopt: for other reasons, and because it fits well into the context. After the mention of the orb of creation, it is natural that the Apostle should take up, with the for (ver. 7), the details of creation, and assert that they might all be tamed by man, but that the tongue is untamable. Again, such sense is most agreeable to the similitude just used, of a small spark kindling a vast forest. The expression in the A. V., the course of nature, is sufficiently near the meaning, and expresses it in better English, perhaps, than any other); and is itself set on fire (in the original the verb is in the present tense, indicating that it is habitually, continually, so set on fire: see below) by hell (which is itself the hell of fire, in Matt. v. 22, and many other places. These words are not to be explained away: but are to be literally taken. It is the devil, for whom hell is prepared, that is the tempter and instigator of the habitual sins of the tongue. It is out of the question [see above] to regard the sentence as alluding to the original temptations of the fall: equally so, to suppose it to have a future reference, and to imply that the tongue shall be tormented in hell: as some have done. Wiesinger says: "This passage reminds us, in its general sense, of the Old Test. sayings, Prov. xvi. 27; Ps. cxx. 2—4; Eccles. xxviii. 11 ff." This last clause is strikingly paralleled by the Targum on Ps. cxx. 2, where the deceitful tongue is compared with coals of juniper, which are set on fire in hell beneath. But none of these passages treats of the destruction which the tongue brings on its own body).

7, 8.] The untameableness of the tongue. The thought in ver. 3, though not directly leading on to this, yet is a hint tending towards it. For (a fresh fact is adduced, substantiating the strong terms used of the mischief of the tongue) every nature (natural generic disposition and character; and so below, when joined to of man: not, kind, 'genus,' as A. V. and many Commentators) of beasts (quadrupeds, see below), and winged things, and of creeping things, and things in the sea (creation is divided into these four classes. The first then is not to be taken in its wide sense, as Acts xxviii. 4, 5, but as distinguished from the other three, i. e. as in quadrupeds, beasts of the earth, proper. The classification in Peter's vision, Acts x., is different: "Fourfooted things of the earth, and beasts, and creeping things, and winged things of heaven:" beasts there at least including the fishes), is (habitually) tamed, and hath been tamed (has long ago been reduced into subjection: such taming has become an enduring fact in the world's history, exemplified every day) by the nature (not, the great skill ; nature means, as before, natural generic character) of man : <sup>8.</sup>] but (excep<sup>n</sup>) the tongue no one of men can tame (the assertion is absolute, not to be weakened by “without great labour,” as some have done. The word in the original means, even to tame, even once : not, to tame habitually. Now we see fully the meaning of ver. 2) : it is a restless mischief, [it is] (compare “adders’ poison is under their lips,” Ps. cxl. 3 ; the characteristic following refers not to the word mischief, but back to the tongue. It is therefore necessary to repeat “it is”) full of death-bringing poison. <sup>9, 10.]</sup> Exemplification of the restless mischief, by the inconsistent use of the tongue. The first person is used of mankind in general, considered as one agent. Therewith bless we (i. e. as applied to God, “praise we”) the Lord and Father (an unusual connexion to designate God : see ch. i. 27, where we have the more usual one, found also here in the ordinary text. Both terms are to be taken of the Father : the former, on the side of His Power : the latter, on that of His Love) ; and therewith curse we men, which (not, who, which would personally designate certain men thus made ; but which, generic. This distinction, which some modern philologists are striving to obliterate, is very important in the rendering of Scripture, and has been accurately observed by our English translators) have been created (and are still, as the perfect tense shews. See below) after the likeness of God (which remains in us, marred indeed, but not, as is sometimes carelessly said, destroyed. This likeness we ought to revere, in ourselves and in others : and he who curses, despises it. Not man’s original state, but man’s present state is here under consideration : and on that consideration depends the force of the Apostle’s argument). <sup>10.]</sup> Out of the same mouth cometh forth blessing and cursing (by this resuming and collocation of the two opposite acts, the inconsistency is further shewn). These things, my brethren, ought not so to take place.

<sup>8</sup> but the tongue can no man tame ; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison. <sup>9</sup> Therewith bless we God, even the Father ; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God. <sup>10</sup> Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be. <sup>11</sup> Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter ? <sup>12</sup> Can the fig tree, my brethren, bear olive berries ? either a vine, figs ? so can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh.

<sup>11.]</sup> Illustration from nature, that such conduct is unnatural. Doth a fountain out of the same chink (hole, from which the water flows, in a rock, or in the earth) send forth the sweet and the bitter (water, of course : but there is no need to supply any thing : the contrast is in the contrary nature of the two) ?

<sup>12.]</sup> Shews further, that natural organizations do not bring forth things opposite to or inconsistent with their usual fruits, but each one has one result, and that always. Can, my brethren, a fig tree bring forth (see on the whole, Matt. vii. 16 ff. De Wette is wrong, when he says that thistles or the like would be here, as there, more agreeable to the similitude. For the reasoning is not here, that we must not look for good fruit from a bad tree : but that no tree can bring forth fruit inconsistent with its own nature) olives, or a vine, figs ? nor

Gal. v. 20. envying and rivalry is, there is confusion and every evil thing. <sup>17</sup> But

(as if the former sentence had been a negative one) can salt [water] bring forth sweet water (i.e. if the mouth emit cursing, thereby making itself a brackish spring, it cannot to any purpose also emit the sweet stream of praise and good words: if it appear to do so, all must be hypocrisy and mere seeming).

13—18.] Wisdom must be shewn by meekness and peaceableness, not by contentiousness. This paragraph is closely connected with the subject of the chapter as enounced in ver. 1. Where that ambition, and rivalry to be teachers, existed, there was sure to be contentiousness and every evil thing.

13.] Who is (compare the similar question in Ps. xxiv. 12) wise and a man of knowledge (the same adjectives are joined in the Septuagint version in Deut. i. 13, 15; iv. 6. It is not easy to mark the difference, if any is here intended) among you? Let him shew out of (the Apostle seems again to be referring to his reasoning in ch. ii. 18. The wisdom and knowledge would be dead without this exhibition, as faith without works) his good conduct (in life) his works (the good conduct is the general manifestation: the works, the particular results of that general manifestation. The sum of both makes up the works in the former case, ch. ii.) in meekness of wisdom (in that meekness which is the proper attribute of wisdom).

14—16.] Consequences of the opposite course. But if ye have (as is the fact: this is implied) bitter emulation (bitter seems to refer back to the example in vv. 11, 12) and rivalry in your heart (out of which come thoughts and words and acts, see Matt. xv. 18, 19), do not (in giving yourselves out for wise, which [compare ver. 15] you cannot really be) boast against and lie against the truth (of which their whole lives would be thus a negation and an opposition;—which would be in their persons vaunted against and lied against).

15.] Designation of such pretended wisdom. This wisdom is not one descending from above (the verb is purposely thus broken up in the original, to throw out the negation, and to put the categorical word, descending, into prominence, as a class to which this wisdom does not belong. So that we must not miss this purpose by rendering “descendeth not,” as does A. V.), but earthly (as the sharpest contrast to descending from above: belonging to this earth, and its life of sin and strife), sensual (it is almost impossible to express satisfactorily in English the idea given by the original word here [psychic, from psyché, the soul]). Our ‘soul’ is so identified with man’s spiritual part in common parlance, that we have lost the distinction between soul and spirit, except when we can give a periphrastic explanation. The idea here is, belonging to the unspiritual mind of man. See the whole treated in the note on Jude 19), devilish (like, or partaking of the nature of, the devils. This word must not be figuratively taken: it betokens both the origin of this hypocritical wisdom [compare set on fire by hell, above, ver. 6], and its character: it is from,—not God, the giver of all true wisdom, ch. i. 5, but the devil,—and bears the character of its author).

16.] Justification of the foregoing assertion. For where is emulation (in a bad sense) and rivalry (see above), there above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy. 18 And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace.

IV. <sup>1</sup> From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war is confusion (anarchy, restless disturbance), and every evil thing (or, deed).

17, 18.] Character and praise of heavenly wisdom. But (contrast) the wisdom from above is first of all pure (it is necessary to guard the mere English reader against the abuse of this text often found, when it is made to signify that the heavenly-wise must be pure, i.e. free from all contact with any thing that offends, before he can be peaceable: and thus it is used to further, instead of to discourage, an uncharitable spirit), then (i.e. 'in the second place:' its external qualities are now enumerated) peaceable, forbearing, easily persuaded, full of compassion (the great triumph of the Christian practical life is won by compassion: see ch. ii. 13) and good fruits (contrast to "every evil thing," above), without doubting (as might be expected, from the various meanings of the Greek term thus rendered, this word has been variously interpreted. Luther, A. V., and most Commentators, render it 'without partiality.' Two considerations contribute to substantiate the rendering given above, which is that of De Wette, Wiesinger, and Huther. 1) The word would seem, from its close junction with 'without hypocrisy,' rather to betoken an inner quality than an outward circumstance; 2) when thus used of an inner quality, ch. i. 6; ii. 4, our Apostle, in common with other New Test. writers, signifies by it 'to doubt.' So that I would understand by it free from all ambiguity and simulation), without feigning ("these two characteristics are also added with especial reference to the state of things among the readers: on without doubting, compare ch. i. 6—8; ii. 4: on without feigning, ch. i. 22, 26; ii. 1." Huther). 18.]

Before, in ver. 16, after the characterization came the statement of the result: and so now here. That result was designed as a present one," "confusion and every evil thing:" this is a future one, but beautifully anticipated by the pregnant expression of "fruit being sown:" see below. But (so literally: passing from the subjective character to the objective result) fruit (or, the fruit) of righteousness (genitive of apposition: that fruit which is righteousness: see Heb. xii. 11; and compare Isa. xxxii. 17: righteousness in its wider sense; in themselves and in others: in practice and in reward: in time and in eternity) is sown (in saying this, the Apostle speaks in anticipation, as if a husbandman should this autumn be said to sow next year's bread) in peace (betokening the spirit and mode in which the sowing takes place, as opposed to where envying and rivalry is) by them who work (better than 'make,' which seems to confine the meaning to the reconciling persons at variance. So also in Matt. v. 9) peace.

1.] Whence are wars, and whence fightings among you (by what follows, it would appear to be not contentions between teachers that are meant, or between sects, but concerning "mine" and "thine." Grotius refers them to the tumults which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem. But this idea, that these are strifes about mine and thine, confines them perhaps to too narrow a space; they seem rather, as Luther, to represent all those quarrels which spring up about common worldly interests from selfish considerations of pride, envy, covetousness, and the like)? Are they not from thence (this second question contains in fact the answer to the former, in an appeal to the consciences of the readers), from your lusts (literally, your pleasures) which militate (campaign, have their camp, and, as it were, forage about. We are meant, in the figure used, to see as the adversaries, our fellow-men, against whom, to put down whom and set ourselves up, our lusts are as it were an army of soldiers ever encamped within us and waging war) in your members?

2.] carries on the assertion in detail. Ye desire (generally: it is not said what: but evidently worldly possessions and honours are intended by the context, vv. 4 ff.), and possess not (lust of possession does not ensure possession itself, then comes a further step, out of this lust): ye murder (but how comes murder to be introduced at this early stage of the development of lust, before desire to have, which itself leads on to wars and fightings? It appears as if we were meant to understand it as alluding to such cases, e.g., as those in the Old Test. of David and Ahab, who, in their desire to possess, committed murder. And if it be said, that this is a hard saying of those who feared the Lord, be it remembered that the Apostle is speaking of wars and fightings, and though he may include under these terms the lesser forms of variance, the greater and more atrocious ones are clearly not excluded. In the state of Jewish society during the apostolic age, it is to be feared that examples of them were but too plentiful, and there is no saying how far the Christian portion of Jewish communities may have suffered themselves to become entangled in such quarrels and their murderous consequences) and envy, and are not able to obtain: ye fight and make war (these words form the final answer to the question with which the section begins: and are therefore not to be joined with the following, as in the A. V.).

Reason why ye have not. Ye have not, because ye ask not (in prayer to God: in the following verse he explains, and as it were corrects this): 3.] ye ask and do not receive, because ye ask amiss (with evil intent, see below), that ye may spend [it] (that which ye ask for) in ('in the exercise of,' 'under the dominion of:' in does not belong to the verb,—'that ye may consume it upon,' as A. V.: 'may spend it,' but to the state in which the spenders are, in the course of satisfying) your lusts. The general sense is: if you really prayed aright, this feeling of continual craving after more worldly things would not exist: all your proper wants would be supplied: and these improper ones which beget wars and fightings among you would not exist. Ye would ask, and ask aright, and consequently would obtain.

4.] Ye adulteresses (the occurrence of the feminine only is rightly explained by Theile: "This denomination, taken from the feminine, and not from the masculine, might be suggested by the figure itself. For it puts God in the place of husband: and thus it is as natural to call individual men adulteresses, as the whole human race, or any particular nation." Some have thought that St. James is addressing Churches here. But God is the Lord and husband of every soul that is His, as much as of every church; and the indignant exclamation of the Apostle is just as applicable to every one who forsakes his or her God, as to an apostate church. This is one of those cases where the testimony of our ancient MSS. is so valuable, in restoring to us the nervous and pregnant rebuke of the original), know ye not that the friendship of the world (the world here, precisely as in ch. i. 27, men, and men's interests and ambitions and employments, in so far as they are without God) is enmity (the state of being an enemy) of God (the man who is taken out of the world by Christ, cannot again become a friend and companion of worldly men and their schemes for self, without passing into enmity with God, of whose family he was a reconciled member. God and the world stand opposed to one another: so that a man cannot join the one without deserting the other. This is further stated in what follows)? whosoever therefore (particular consequence on the general axiom just stated; carried however further, into all approach to, and not merely the completion of the outward state) shall be minded (sets his mind and thought and wish that way. He that would be a friend of the world, must make up his mind to be God's enemy) to be a friend of the world, is (thereby, by the proceeding in the direction indicated by that mind) constituted (as above; not merely 'is,' or 'becomes;' 'becomes,' 'then and there,' is rather the meaning) an enemy of God.

5, 6.] Testimony from Scripture to convince further those who might question what has just been stated. Or (the formula puts a hypothetical alternative, the assumption of which negatives itself) do you think that the Scripture saith in vain, The Spirit that He (God) placed in us (viz. when the Spirit descended on the church) jealously desireth (us for his own)? These words connect naturally with the foregoing. We are married to one, even God, who has implanted in us His Spirit: and He is a jealous God, who will not suffer us to be friends of His enemy and His friends at the same time. The only difficulty seems to be, to trace this latter saying in any part of Scripture. I will state the solution which seems to me the most probable, and then give an account of other methods of solving it. The emphasis of this clause lies on the words jealously desireth: and, interpreting those words as above, we are naturally led to ask, is there any chapter or passage especially, where such a mind towards His people is ascribed to God? And this directs our thoughts at once to Deut. xxxii., where the love of Jehovah for Israel, and His jealousy over them is described. In that song of Moses we have this very word used of God, ver. 19—21. So that here we have the elements of the sense of that which is cited, viz. the jealous desire of the Lord over His people. And for the rest, "the Spirit that He placed in us," the only solution seems to be, that the Apostle translates into the language of the Gospel the former declarations of the God of Israel, e.g. such as that Num. xxxv. 34, "I the Lord dwell among the children of Israel," combining them with such prophecies as Ezek. xxxvi. 27, "I will put my Spirit within you." I own that such a solution does not seem to me wholly satisfactory: still there is nothing improbable in the idea that St. James may have combined the general sense of Scripture on the point of God's jealousy over His people, and instead of the God who dwelt in Israel, may have placed the Holy Spirit who dwelleth in us. At all events it is better to understand it thus, than to force the words of the citation from their simple meaning. The statement of the other interpretations of this difficult verse would be quite unintelligible to an English reader. It will be found in my Greek Test. With regard to the sense above given, as fitting into the context, Theile well says, that it introduces us into the same figurative realm of thought in which the appellation "adulteresses" placed us before. The Apostle is speaking of the eager and jealous love of God towards those whom He has united as it were in the bond of marriage with Himself.

6.] But He (God, by His Holy Spirit dwelling in us, the same subject as in the previous sentence) giveth the more grace (the more and greater, for this longing and jealous desire): wherefore he saith (the Spirit, again: for it is the same Spirit who is implanted in us that speaks in Scripture), God (the Lord, in the Septuagint; and the same variation is found where the words are again cited in 1 Pet. v. 5) is set against the proud, but giveth grace to the lowly (—see Rom. xii. 16. This is a proof that the ambitious and restless after worldly honours and riches, are God's enemies, whereas the humble and lowly are the objects of His gifts of ever-increasing grace. The inference follows in the shape of solemn exhortation). 7—10.]

Submit yourselves therefore to God (addressed mainly to the proud—the adulteresses above; but also to all); but resist the devil (the rebel of this world), and he shall flee (better than the A. V. 'will flee,' which is merely an assurance as from man to man: this is a divine promise) from you: draw near to God, and He will draw near (here better 'will:' in speaking of the divine dealings, positive declarations are better softened: see John xvi. 23, A. V. Not that this is always observed: see Rev. vii. 17, A. V.). But it is only the pure in heart and hand that can approach God: therefore—Purify your hands (the hands being the external organs of action, and becoming polluted by the act, as e. g. by blood in the act of murder: see Isa. i. 15, lix. 3: 1 Tim. ii. 8. And, for both the particulars here mentioned, Ps. xxiv. 4), ye sinners: and make chaste your hearts (in allusion to the figure of "adultery" above), ye double-minded (ye whose affections are divided between God and the world. The Apostle is addressing not two classes of persons, but one and the same: the sinners are double-minded).

9.] This cannot be done without true and earnest repentance, leading them through deep sorrow. Be wretched (in your minds, from a sense of your sinfulness. That such feeling will have its outward demonstrations is evident: but this word itself does not allude to them), and mourn and weep (here again, the exhortation does not regard outward things, as a mourning habit, or the like. These may follow on that which is here commanded, but are not the thing itself): let your laughter be turned into mourning (now he speaks rather of outward manifestations), and your joy into humiliation (literally, casting down of the eyes: hence shame or humiliation, which produces such downcast looks. These latter are more said of the inner states of mind).

10.] Conclusion of the exhortation: the true way to exaltation, through humility. Be humbled before the Lord (Matt. xxiii. 12, and 1 Pet. v. 6: but "under the hand of God" there is not an equivalent to in the sight of, or, before the Lord here. The latter gives more the realization in the soul of the presence of God, as drawing near to Him in humility: that, the subjection to Him in recognition of His providence and His judgments. The Lord, not Christ, but the Father: see on ch. i. 7), and He shall exalt you (both here and hereafter: by His grace and counsel here to the hidden glory of His waiting children, and by His fruition and presence hereafter to the ineffable glory of His manifested children; in due time, as 1 Pet. v. 6. Compare Luke i. 52; Job v. 11; Ezek. xxi. 26).

11, 12.] Exhortation against evil speaking and uncharitable judgment. Some have thought that there is no close connexion with the preceding: and Huther urges this from the milder word brethren being here used, whereas before it was "adulteresses," "sinners," "double-minded." But it may be observed, that St. James frequently begins his exhortations mildly, and moves onward into severity: in this very paragraph we have an example of it, where unquestionably the tone of the question, "Who art thou that judgest thy neighbour?" is more severe than the "brethren" with which it began. The connexion is with the whole spirit of this part of the Epistle, as dissuading mutual quarrels, undue self exaltation, and neighbour depreciation. Chap. iii. dealt with the sins of the tongue: and now, after speaking against pride and strife, the Apostle naturally returns to them, as springing out of a proud uncharitable spirit. Do not speak against one another (it is evident, what sort of speaking against one another he means, by the junction of judging with it below: it is that kind which follows upon unfavourable judgment:—depreciation of character and motive), brethren (prepares the way for the frequent mention of a brother below): he that speaketh against a brother, or judgeth his brother, speaketh against the law (of Christian life: the old moral law glorified and amplified by Christ: the "royal law," ch. ii. 8; "law of Christ," i. 25), and judgeth the law (viz. by setting himself up over that law, as pronouncing upon its observance or non-observance by another): but if (as thou dost) thou judgest the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge (seeing that he who judges, judges not only the man before him, but the law also: for he pronounces not only on the fact, but on that fact being, or not being, a breach of the law. So that thus to bring men's actions under the cognizance of the law, is the office of a judge).

12.] One (God) is the lawgiver and judge (unites these two offices in His own person: the latter of them depending on the former), He who is able to save and destroy (He who is able, because He alone has the power to carry out His judgment when pronounced. On the word save, see on ch. i. 21, ii. 14, as relating to ultimate salvation: and on save and destroy, Matt. x. 28, to which this is the key-text, fixing the reference there to God, and not to God's Enemy): but thou, who art thou (thou feeble man, who hast no such power, and who art not the lawgiver) that judgest thy neighbour?

13—17.] Against ungodly and presumptuous confidence in our worldly plans for the future. This again falls into the previous context, where we are warned against hearts divided between God and the world. But, as has been rightly remarked as early as Bede, and by many since, St. James, though carrying on the same subject, is no longer, from this place to ch. v. 6, addressing members of Christ's church, but those without: the ungodly and the rich in this world. This however must be taken with just this reservation,—that he addresses Christians in so far as they allow themselves to be identified with those others. This first paragraph, for example, might well serve as a warning for Christians who are in the habit of leaving God out of their thoughts and plans. That it is still Jews who are addressed, appears from ver. 15, and ch. v. 4. Go to now (Bengel calls this an exclamation to excite attention. This seems to be deed that was spoken of. It is not sins of omission that men are here convicted of, as so often mistakenly supposed: but the doing evil, as in the case of the speech above supposed, where good is easy and obvious), it is sin to him (i. e. reckoned to him as sin).

CHAP. V. 1-6.] Denunciation of woe on the rich in this world. These verses need not necessarily be addressed (as Luther) to the same persons as ch. iv. 13 ff. Indeed the go to now repeated seems to indicate a fresh beginning. Commentators have differed as to whether this denunciation has for its object, or not, exhortation to repentance. I believe the right answer to be, much as De Wette, that in the outward form indeed the words contain no such exhortation: but that we are bound to believe all such triumphant denunciation to have but one ultimate view, that of grace and mercy to those addressed. That such does not here appear, is owing chiefly to the close proximity of judgment, which the writer has before him. Calvin then is in the main right,—when he says, “They are wrong who imagine that James is here exhorting rich men to repentance: it seems to me rather to be a simple denunciation of the judgment of God, with which he wished to alarm them without hope of pardon,”—except in those four last rather characteristic words. 1.] Go to now (see above, ch. iv. 13), ye rich, go weep (the tense in the original gives the command a concentrated force, as that which ought to be done at once and without delay), howling (it is a word in the Old Test. confined to the prophets, and used, as here, with reference to the near approach of God’s judgments. See Isa. xlii. 6) over your miseries which are coming on (no supply of the word “you” is required after the verb. These miseries are not to be thought of as the natural and determined end of all worldly riches, but are the judgments connected with the coming of the Lord: see ver. 8. It may be that this prospect was as yet intimately bound up with the approaching destruction of the Jewish city and polity: for it must be remembered that they are Jews who are here addressed). 2.] The effect of the coming judgment is depicted as already present, and its material as already stored up against them. What is meant by the figure used, we learn in ver. 4. Your riches are corrupted (see Job xxxiii. 21: xl. 7. The expression is figurative, and to be understood of all riches;—“your possessions”), and your garments (the general term riches is now split into its component parts, clothing and treasure) are become moth-eaten (ref.: see also Isa. li. 8; Acts xii. 23. The reference to Matt. vi. 19, 20 is obvious): 3.] your gold and your silver is rusted through (the language is popular, seeing that gold does not contract rust. In the Epistle of Jeremiah, xii. 24, the same terms are used of golden and silver images of idols. Rust, happening generally to metals, is predicated of gold and silver without care for exact precision. So that there is no need to seek for some interpretation which may make the expression true of gold, as that [Bretschneider] copper vessels plated with gold are intended. The stern and vivid depiction of prophetic denunciation does not take such trifles into account), and the rust of them shall be for a testimony to you (not, as A. V., “against you,” i. e., the rust which you have allowed to accumulate on them by want of use, shall testify against you in judgment,—but, as Wiesinger and Luther rightly, seeing that the rust is the effect of judgment begun, not of want of use,—the rust of them is a token what shall happen to yourselves: in the consuming of your wealth, you see depicted your own), and shall eat your flesh as fire (i. e. as fire devours the flesh). Ye laid up treasure in (not “for,” or “against”) the last days (i.e. in these, the last days before the coming of the Lord, ye, instead of repenting and saving your souls, laid up treasure to no profit; employed yourselves in the vain accumulation of this world’s wealth. The past tense, as so often when the course of life and action is spoken of, is used as if from the standing-point of the day of judgment, looking back over this life).

4—6.] Specification of the sins, the incipient judgments for which hitherto have been hinted at under the figures of rust and moth. And 4.] the unjust frauds of the rich, in non payment of just debts. Behold (belongs to the fervid graphic style), the hire of the workmen who mowed your fields, which has been held back (for the sense, see Lev. xix. 13; Jer. xxii. 13, and especially Mal. iii. 5. In Eccles. xxxiv. 22, we have, “He that defraudgeth the labourer of his hire is a bloodshedder”), crieth out (for vengeance on you. See Gen. iv. 10) from you (i.e. from your possession, where you have deposited it: from your coffers, where it lies); and the cries of them who reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord of hosts (not only does the abstracted hire cry out from its place, but the defrauded victims themselves join, and the cry is heard of God. This is the only place in the New Test. where the Lord of Sabaoth (hosts) is used by any writer: Rom. ix. 29 is a citation. The Jewish character of the whole will sufficiently account for it. Bede gives another reason, which also doubtless was in the Apostle’s mind: “He calls God the Lord of armies, to strike terror into those who imagine that the poor have no defender”).

5.] Second class of sins: luxury and self-indulgence. Ye luxuriated on the earth (the last words of ver. 4 placed the thought in heaven, where their judgment is laid up) and wanted, ye nourished (satiated, fattened) your hearts (compare Acts xiv. 17. Although the body is really that which is filled, the heart is that in which the satisfaction of repletion is felt) in the day of slaughter (i.e. as Theile, “Like cattle, who on the very day of slaughter feed and fill themselves, happy and careless.” Compare Jer. xii. 3. This seems the simplest and most obvious interpretation. Many Commentators understand the day of slaughter to mean a day of banqueting, when oxen and fattlings are slain).

6.] Third class of sins: condemning the innocent. Ye condemned, ye murdered the just man (these words are probably spoken generally, the singular being collective. “The just man,” not merely “the innocent man,” it is his justice itself which provokes the enmity and cruelty of the rich. It has been usual to refer these words to the condemnation and execution of Christ. But there is surely nothing in the context to indicate this, further than that such a particular case may be included in the general charge, as its most notorious example. I cannot see, with Luther, how the present tense, “doth not resist,” makes against this; for any how we must suppose a change of sense before the present can be introduced: and then it may as well be a description of Christ’s patient endurance, or of His present long-suffering, as of the present meekness of the [generic] just man. But I prefer the latter, and with it the other reference throughout): he (the just man) doth not resist you (the behaviour of the just under your persecutions is ever that of meekness and submission. This last clause serves as a note of transition to what follows. So Herder remarks, as cited by Wiesinger: "And thus we have as it were standing before us the slain and unresisting righteous man, when lo the curtain falls: Be patient, brethren, wait!" See, on the whole sense, Amos ii. 6, 7; v. 12; and the description in Wisd. ii. 6—20).

7—11.] Exhortation to suffering Christians to endure unto the coming of the Lord. On the connexion, see above.

7.] Be patient therefore ("therefore" is a general reference to the prophetic strain of the previous passage: judgment on your oppressors being so near, and your own part, as the Lord's just ones, being that of unresistingness), brethren (contrast to the rich men, last addressed), until the coming of the Lord (i. e. here, beyond all reasonable question, of Christ. The Lord, it is true, usually in this Epistle is to be taken in the Old Test. sense, as denoting the Father: but we have in ch. i. 1; ii. 1, examples of St. James using it of our Saviour, and it is therefore better to keep so well-known a phrase to its ordinary meaning).

Encouragement by the example of the husbandman. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, being patient over it (with reference to it: as it were sitting over it and watching it) till it (better than 'he,' as Luther and A. V.) shall have received the early and latter [rain] (see refl. It appears that the early rain fell in Oct., Nov., and Dec., extending, with occasional snow, into Jan. See refl. Deut., Jer.:

and after fine spring weather in Feb., the latter rain in March to the end of April, Jer. iii. 3, Heb. and A. V.): 8.] be ye also patient (as well as, after the example of, the husbandman): establish (confirm, strengthen, both which are required for patience) your hearts, because the coming of the Lord is nigh.

9.] Exhortation to mutual forbearance. "He has been encouraging them to suffer open and grave injuries from the wicked with fortitude: he now exhorts the same persons to be prompt in making up, or concealing, those lesser offences which often arise among Christians themselves. For it happens that those who bear often with equanimity the greatest contumelies and injuries from enemies and wicked men, yet cannot easily bear much less offences when given by their brethren." Horneius. Murmur not, brethren, against one another, that ye be not judged (seeing that murmuring against one another involves the violation of our Lord's "judge not" [Matt. vii. 1], he finishes with the following clause there, "that ye be not judged:" the passive verb here, as there, being to be taken in a condemnatory sense, or at all events as assuming the condemnatory issue): behold, the Judge standeth before the door (the Judge, viz. the Lord. These last words are added with a view to both portions of the sentence preceding, not to the latter one only. The near approach of the Judge is a motive for suspending our own judgment, as well as for deterring us from incurring that speedy judgment on ourselves which we shall incur if we do not suspend it).

affliction by Old Test. examples. Take, my brethren, as an example of affliction (not 'of enduring' or 'suffering affliction,' as A. V.) and of patience the prophets (so Matt. v. 12), who spoke in the name (or, by the name) of the Lord (God). <sup>11.</sup> Another example, in which a further point is gained. Behold, we count happy them that have endured (see Matt. v. 10): ye [have] heard of the endurance of Job; behold also (A. V. "and have seen." The testimony of the ancient MSS. is divided; but the imperative is the more probable reading) the end of the Lord ('the termination which the Lord [in Old Test. sense] gave:' do not limit your attention to Job's sufferings, but look on to the end and see the mercy shewn him by God); for (better than 'that,' as A. V.: the sense being, 'Job's patience is known to you all: do not rest there, but look on to the end which God gave him: and it is well worth your while so to do, for you will find that He is, &c.') And this has apparently occasioned the repetition by the Apostle of the words the Lord the Lord is very pitiful and merciful (this remembrance of God's pity and mercy would encourage them also to hope that whatever their sufferings, the "end of the Lord" might prove similar in their own case).

is still in view, is evident from "Is any afflicted?" which follows: that it alone is not in view is equally evident, from the "Is any merry?" which also follows. So that we may safely say that the Apostle passes from their particular temptations under suffering to their general temptations in life. But (contrast of the spirit which would prompt that which he is about to forbid, to that recommended in the last verses) above all things (meaning, 'So far is the practice alien from Christian meekness, that whatever you feel or say, let it not for a moment be given way to'), my brethren, swear not, neither by the heaven, nor by the earth, nor by any other oath (Huther's note here is valuable and just: "It is to be noticed, that swearing by the name of God is not mentioned: for we must not imagine that this is included in the last member of the clause, the Apostle intending evidently by the words, 'or by any other oath,' to point only at similar formulæ, of which several are mentioned in Matt. v. 34, 35. Had he intended to forbid swearing by the name of God, he would most certainly have mentioned it expressly: for not only is it in the law, in contradistinction to other oaths, commanded,—see Deut. vi. 13; x. 20; Ps. lxxiii. 11,—but in the prophets is announced as a token of the future turning of men to God: ref. Isa. ; Jer. xii. 16; xxiii. 7, 8. The omission of notice of this oath shews that James in this warning has in view only the abuse, common among the Jews generally and among his readers, of introducing in the common every-day affairs of life, instead of the common yea and nay, such asseverations as those here mentioned: so that we are not justified in deducing from his words any prohibition of swearing in general, as has been attempted by many expositors of our Epistle. The use of oaths by heaven, &c., arises on the one hand from forgetting that every oath, in its deeper significance, is a swearing by God, and on the other from a depreciation of simple truth in words: either way therefore from a lightness and frivolity which is in direct contrast to the earnest seriousness of a Christian spirit." See my note on Matt. v. 34: but (contrast to the habit of swearing) let your yea be yea, and [your] nay, nay (it is hardly possible here to render "But let yours be [your habit of conversation be] yea yea and nay nay," on account of the position of the words in the original. So that, in form at least, our precept here differs slightly from that in St. Matt. The fact represented by both would be the same: confidence in men's simple assertions, and consequently absence of all need for asseveration): that ye fall not under judgment (i. e. condemnation: not as the meaning of the word used, but as the necessary contextual result. The words in fact nearly amount to "that ye be not judged" above. Notice, that there is here no exhortation to truthful speaking, as so many Commentators have assumed: that is not in question at all).

<sup>13.</sup>] The connexion seems to be, Let not this light and frivolous spirit at any time appear among you: if suffering, or if rejoicing, express your feelings not by random and unjustifiable exclamations, but in a Christian and sober manner, as here prescribed. Is any among you in trouble? let him pray. Is any in joy (light of heart)? let him sing praise (literally, play on an instrument: but used in Rom. xv. 9, and 1 Cor. xiv. 15, and elsewhere, of singing praise generally). <sup>14.</sup>] Is any sick among you (here one case of affliction is specified, and for it specific directions are given)? let him summon to him (send for) the elders of the congregation (to which he belongs: but not, some one among those elders, as many Roman-Catholic interpreters. The Council of Trent anathematizes those who say that these elders are not priests ordained by a bishop, but elders in age in the congregation, and thus deny that the priest is the sole administrator of extreme unction. It is true the elders are not simply "the elders in age in every congregation," but those who were officially elders, or bishops, which in the apostolic times were identical: see notes on Acts xx. 17, 28: so that "priests ordained by a bishop" above, would, as applied to the text, be an anachronism), and let them pray over him (either 1. literally as coming and standing over his bed: or 2. figuratively, with reference to him, as if their intent in praying, went out towards him), anointing (or, when they have anointed), him with oil in the name of the Lord (the act thus qualified was plainly not a mere human medium of cure, but had a sacramental character: compare the same words, used of baptism, Matt. xxviii. 19; Acts ii. 38; x. 48; xix. 5; 1 Cor. i. 13, 15. The Lord here is probably Christ, from analogy: His name being universally used as the vehicle of all miraculous power exercised by His followers).

mental form of extreme unction (!), shall save the sick, i. e., shall confer on him grace by which his soul may be saved." Some Commentators take both meanings. The Council of Trent prevaricates between the two) the sick man, and the Lord (most probably Christ, again: He who is Lord in the Christian church) shall raise him up (from his bed of sickness: thus the Greek word is used in Mark i. 31; Matt. viii. 15; ix. 5—7, &c. Here again our R.-Cath. friends are in sad perplexity, seeing that these words entirely deprive the passage of all relevancy to extreme unction): even if he have committed (he be in a state of having committed, i. e. abiding under the consequence of, some commission of sin; for so the perfect tense implies; and hereby the sin in question is presumed to have been the working cause of his present sickness) sins, it shall be forgiven him (supply as a subject, the having committed them, from the foregoing).

Among all the daring perversions of Scripture by which the Church of Rome has defended her superstitions, there is none more patent than that of the present passage. Not without reason has the Council of Trent defended its misinterpretation with the anathema above cited: for indeed it needed that, and every other recommendation, to support it, and give it any kind of acceptance. The Apostle is treating of a matter totally distinct from the occasion, and the object, of extreme unction. He is enforcing the efficacy of the prayer of faith in afflictions, ver. 13. Of such efficacy, he adduces one special instance. In sickness, let the sick man inform the elders of the Church. Let them, representing the congregation of the faithful, pray over the sick man, accompanying that prayer with the symbolic and sacramental act of anointing with oil in the name of the Lord. Then, the prayer of faith (see Cornelius-a-Lapide above for the audacious interpretation) shall save (heal) the sick man, and the Lord shall bring him up out of his sickness; and even if it were occasioned by some sin, that sin shall be forgiven him. Such is the simple and undeniable sense of the Apostle, arguing for the efficacy of prayer: and such, as above seen, the perversion of that sense by the Church of Rome. Here, as in the rest of these cases, it is our comfort to know that there is a God of truth, whose judgment shall begin at His Church. Observe, the promises here made of recovery and forgiveness are unconditional, as in Mark xvi. 18, &c.

<sup>16.</sup> A general injunction arising out of a circumstance necessarily to be inferred in the preceding example. There, the sin would of necessity have been confessed to the elders, before the prayer of faith could deal with it. And seeing the blessed consequences in that case,—“generally,” says the Apostle, “in all similar cases, and one to another universally, pursue the same salutary practice of confessing your sins.” Confess therefore to one another (not only to the presbyters in the case supposed, but to one another generally) your transgressions (i. e. not merely offences against your brethren; but also sins against God: compare Matt. vi. 14, 15), and pray for one another that ye may be healed (in case of sickness, as above. The context here forbids any wider meaning; and so rightly De Wette, Wiesinger, and Huther. So even Cornelius-a-Lapide). It might appear astonishing, were it not notorious, that on this passage among others is built the Romish doctrine of the necessity of confessing sins to a priest. As a specimen of the way in which it is deduced, I subjoin Cornelius-a-Lapide's explanation “‘One another’ i. e. confess, man to man, like to like, brother to brother, namely to the priest, who though in office he be superior, yet by nature is equal, like in infirmity, the same in obligation of confessing.” Cajetan, on the contrary, denies that “sacramental confession” is here spoken of: here, as in so many other cases, the much-vaunted unity of Roman interpreters embracing the most opposite opinions. The supplication of a righteous man (i. e. of one who shews his faith by his works, see ch. ii. 24) availeth much in its working (i. e. worketh very effectually. Much doubt has arisen about the meaning and reference of this last term. It is usually taken as in A. V.,—"the effectual fervent prayer,"—as an epithet setting forth its fervency. This interpretation however has not only, as Wiesinger confesses, New Test. usage against it, but can hardly be justified from the context, it being necessarily implied that the prayer of the righteous man is not a dead and formal one. Besides which, the force of the general sentence, "the prayer of a righteous man availeth much," suffers much from the appending of a condition under which alone the sentence could be true).

Elijah was a man of like passions with us (this precedes, to obviate the objection that the greatness of Elijah, so far out of our reach, neutralizes the example for us weak and ordinary men. There is no contrast to the just man intended, but rather Elijah is an example of a just man), and he prayed with prayer (made it a special matter of prayer: not, prayed earnestly, as A. V., and others) that it might not rain (this fact is not even hinted at in the Old Test. history in 1 Kings xvii. ff.; nor the following one, that he prayed for rain at the end of the drought: though this latter may perhaps be implied in 1 Kings xviii. 42 ff.), and it rained not on the earth for three years and six months (so also Luke iv. 25: and in a Rabbinical work this, "In the thirteenth year of Ahab, a famine prevailed in Samaria for three years and a half." There is no real discrepancy here, as has been often assumed, with the account in 1 Kings: for as Benson has rightly observed, the words "in the third year" of 1 Kings xviii. 1 by no necessity refer to the duration of the famine, but most naturally date back to the removal of Elijah to Zarephath, xvii. 8 ff.; compare the same "many days" in ver. 15, where indeed a variation is "for a full year"); and again he prayed (see above), and the heavens gave rain and the earth brought forth her fruit (which she is accustomed to bear).

19, 20.] The importance and blessing of reclaiming an erring brother. This is very nearly connected with the foregoing; the duty of mutual advice and correction, with that of mutual confession and prayer.

19.] Brethren, if any among you be seduced (literally passive; and there is no reason why the passive signification should not be kept, especially when we remember our Lord's warning, "Take heed that no man deceive, seduce you") from the truth (not merely truth practical, of moral conduct, but that truth which is the subject of the word whereby our regeneration took place, ch. i. 18; the doctrine of Christ, spiritual and practical), and one convert him (turn him back to the truth); know (or, let him know, viz. the converted man—for his comfort, and for the encouragement of others to do the like by this proclamation of the fact), that he who converteth (not, 'has converted;' our English present, when connected with a future, exactly gives the meaning) a sinner from the error of his way (thus is the person converted more generally expressed than before; not only

See 1 Pet. iv. 8, and for the expression, Ps. xxxi. 1; Neh. iv. 5. The word sins, following sinners, necessarily binds the reference to the converted, not the converters. It is not "his sins" [the ancient Syriac version so renders it], because the Apostle wishes to put in its most striking abstract light the good deed thus done. The objection that thus we should have a tautology,—the saving of the soul of the converted man, including the covering of his sins, is entirely obviated by this latter consideration. The idea that they are the sins of the converter is thus as abhorrent from the context, as it is generally repugnant to apostolic teaching. Compare, on the whole, 1 Pet. iv. 8).

This leading character of the readers of 1 Peter has been acknowledged generally: see testimonies in Introduction. At the same time, as there argued, there is no reason to exclude Gentile Christians from among them, as forming part of the Israel of God. Indeed, such readers are presupposed in the Epistle itself: compare ver. 14, ch. ii. 10, iv. 3) of Pontus (see Acts ii. 9, note), Galatia (see Intro. to Gal. § ii.), Cappadocia (Acts, as above), Asia (not quite as in Acts ii. 9, xvi. 6, where Phrygia is distinguished from it: here it must be included), and Bithynia (Acts xvi. 7, note: and on the whole geographical extent embraced by the terms, and inferences to be gathered from their order of sequence, see Introduction), according to foreknowledge (this signifies not merely knowledge of their faith beforehand, as some interpret it, but counsel or fore-ordaining. "God causes election, and does not discover it only." See on ver. 20, where the signification 'fore-decreed' is necessary to the context) of God the Father (thus indicated, as leading on to the great mystery of the Holy Trinity in the work of our salvation) in (not 'through,' as A. great day of atonement, only the sacred vessels were thus sprinkled. So also in Heb. ix. 13. But we need not confine the virtue of the sprinkling to admission into the covenant. Doubtless its purifying power, especially as connected with obedience, is also in the mind of the Apostle. The Death of Christ is not only, as looking back on the past, a propitiation for sin, thereby removing the obstacle which stood in the way of God's gracious purpose towards man,—but also, looking forward to the future, a capacitating of us for the participation in God's salvation: just as Israel, sin having been atoned for by the sacrifice itself, was admitted into the actual state of reconciliation by the sprinkling on them of the sacrificial blood. "By this description of the readers, an anticipation is given of the whole train of thought in the Epistle: the aim of which is to impress the blessed certainty of salvation, and with that, the obligations incurred by receiving God's gift," Harless): grace and peace be multiplied unto you (so, but more fully, in reff. 2 Pet.; Jude 1. "Peace is distinguished from grace, as a fruit, or effect, from its cause," Gerhard. "May your peace be multiplied" is quoted as a rabbinical salutation).

3—12.] The Apostle begins, much after the manner of St. Paul in the opening of his Epistles, with giving thanks to God for the greatness of the blessings of salvation; thus paving the way for the exhortations which are to follow. And herein, he directs his readers to look, first, forward into the future [vv. 3—9]; then backward into the past [vv. 10—12].

3—5.] Thanksgiving for the living hope into which the Christian has been begotten.

3.] Blessed be (this particular word, which is not the same as that so rendered in Matt. xxi. 9 and parallels; xxiii. 39; xxv. 36; Luke i. 28, &c., is used in the New Test. of God only: and so almost always in the Old Test.) the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (so verbatim Eph. i. 3, where see note), who according to his much mercy (compare "being rich in mercy," Eph. ii. 4) begat us again (as in ver. 23 and elsewhere in the New Test., where the idea, though not the word occurs,—spoken of the new birth from the state of nature to the state of grace, the work of God the Spirit [ver. 2], by means of the word [ver. 23], in virtue of Christ's propitiatory sacrifice and of union with Him [vv. 2, 18; ch. ii. 24, iii. 18]) unto (either unto as aim and end, being equivalent to "that we might have," or local, unto, into; "so that we have." The latter is here preferable, seeing that hope is not the aim, but the condition, of the Christian life) a living hope (living, as connected with begetting again; it is a life of hope, a life in which hope is the energizing principle. This is better than to understand it as contrasting our hope with that of the hypocrite, which shall perish: as Leighton, in some of his most beautiful language. Hope is not to be understood of the object of hope, but of hope properly so called, subjectively. This hope of the Christian "has life in itself, gives life, and looks for life as its object," De Wette) through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead (to what does this through refer? Ecumenius says, "Whence hath it life? From Jesus Christ, who arose from the dead." Similarly Luther, Bengel, &c. But, while we retain distinctly the connexion of our living hope with the life of Him on whom it depends, it is much more natural to join this instrumental clause with the verb begat, as bringing in with it the whole clause, us to a living hope, by which it is defined. The resurrection of Christ, bringing in life and the gift of the life-giving Spirit, is that which potentiates the new birth into a living hope), 4.] unto (this unto, as the former one, depends on begat us again, and is co-ordinate to the other. It introduces the objective end to which our hope is directed. "During our pilgrimage, we have a living hope: when it is finished,

This inheritance is more closely defined, as salvation [vv. 5, 9], as grace, grace of life [ver. 13, ch. iii. 7], as glory [ch. v. 1], as an unfading crown of glory [ch. v. 4], or the eternal glory of God [ch. v. 10]. The simplest expression for that, which the Apostle calls inheritance, is on the one side the grace of life with its glory, on the other the salvation of souls. This inheritance is the full possession of that, which was promised to Abraham and all believers [Gen. xii. 3, see Gal. iii. 6 ff.], an inheritance, as much higher than that which fell to the children of Israel in the possession of Canaan, as the sonship of the regenerate, who have already received the promise of the Spirit through faith as a pledge of their inheritance, is higher than the sonship of Israel: compare Gal. iii. 18, 29; 1 Cor. vi. 9; Eph. v. 5; Heb. ix. 15." Leighton), undefiled (Leighton quotes from Jerome, "The rich are either unrighteous, or the heirs of the unrighteous." "All possessions here are defiled and stained with many defects and failings: still somewhat wanting, some damp on them, or crack in them: fair houses, but sad cares flying about the gilded and ceiled roofs: stately and soft beds and a full table, but a sickly body and queasy stomach. . . . All possessions are stained with sin, either in acquiring or using them, and therefore they are called mammon of unrighteousness, Luke xvi. 9"), and unfading (in its beauty; which in all earthly things is passing and soon withered: see ver. 24. So that our inheritance is glorious in these three respects: it is in substance, incorruptible: in purity, undefiled: in beauty, unfading. Bengel has remarked that St. Peter loves accumulated synonyms: vv. 7, 8, 19: ch. v. 10), reserved (laid up, Col. i. 5) in the heavens ("that we may be sure it is safe," Calvin: also reflecting back on the epithets above, because all that is there is incorruptible and undefiled and unfading. The Greek interpreters make these words an argument against the millenarians: so Ecumenius, "If the inheritance is in the heavens, the millenarian restitution is fabulous") for (with a view to) you (turning again to his readers from the general statement of ver. 3), 5.] who are being guarded ("what avails it that salvation is laid up for us in heaven, if we are tossed about in the world as in a turbulent sea? What avails it that our salvation is kept in a tranquil harbour, if we are drifting among a thousand shipwrecks? The Apostle thus anticipates objections of this kind." Calvin. "The inheritance is reserved: the heirs are guarded: neither shall it fail them, nor they it." Bengel. "The word kept here is a military term. The saints when in danger, may know that as many as their perils, so many are their guards provided by God: thousands of thousands keep watch over them." 6—9.] Joy of the Christian at the realization of this end of his faith.

6.] It has been much disputed whether this verse (as also ver. 8, see there) is to be taken of present joy, or of future. In the latter case the present verb in both places must be a categorical present, used of a future. And this sense seems to be sanctioned by ver. 8, in which he could hardly predicate of his readers, that they at the present time rejoiced with joy unspeakable and already glorified. To avoid this, those who suppose the whole to allude to the time present, and the realization of future bliss by faith, imagine the present verb, "ye rejoice," to have a slight hortatory force, reminding them of their duty in the matter. This however again will hardly suit the very strong qualifying terms above quoted from ver. 8. On the whole, after consideration, I prefer the former interpretation, and the as-if-future sense of the verb "rejoice" in both places.

In which (i. e. in the last time: the in is temporal, bearing the same sense in the resumption, as it did at the end of ver. 5, from which it is resumed. Such is our Apostle's manner, to resume, in proceeding further, the thing or person just mentioned, in the same sense as before: compare vv. 5, 8, 10) ye rejoice (the verb is a strong word, implying the external expression and exuberant triumph of joy: ye exult), for a little time (as in ch. v. 10) at present (this would, on the hypothesis of ye rejoice being a proper present, be superfluous) if it must be so (if it be God's will that it should be so: if is hypothetical, not affirmative. As Œcumenius says, "for all the saints are not in affliction") having been afflicted (this past participle, more than any thing, favours the as-if-future acceptance of the verb, "ye rejoice:" looking back from the time of which exultation, the grief is regarded as passed away and gone. It carries with it, as indeed it is rendered in A. V., a slightly adversative sense,—"though ye were troubled," "troubled as ye were," or the like) in (not through, but the element and material of the affliction) manifold temptations (temptations, as in James i. 2, 12, trials, arising from whatever cause; here, mainly from persecution; see ch. iv. 12 ff., on the "fiery infliction which comes for your trial." manifold: see James i. 2):

No supply before 'gold,' such as 'of,' as in A. V., or 'that of,' is legitimate. It is not 'the proof' which is precious, though the literal construction at first sight seems to be this, but the faith itself: see above), yet is (usually, habitually) proved by fire (the yet in this clause brings out this, that gold though perishable yet needs fire to try it—the inference lying in the background, how much more does your faith, which is being proved for eternity, not for mere temporary use, need a fiery trial?), may be found (finally and once for all, as the result of the judicial trial at that day) unto (having as its result) praise and glory and honour (whose? Here the matter treated of is the praise of the elect themselves. Some have pressed the meanings of the separate words: the praise being from the Judge, His "Well done, good servant:" glory, admission into His glory, ch. v. 1, 10: the honour, the dignity and personal honour thence accruing, ch. iii. 7. But perhaps, as in Rom. ii. 7, we should rather regard them here as cumulative) in (so literally: i.e. 'at the day of:' the element, in time, in which it shall be manifested) the revelation of Jesus Christ (i.e. His return, who is now withdrawn from our sight, but shall then appear again: and with His revelation shall come also the revelation of the sons of God, Rom. viii. 19; 1 John iii. 2):

8.] whom (it is in the manner of our Apostle to take up anew and with a fresh line of thought, a person or thing just mentioned: see above on ver. 6) having not seen ye love (now, at this present time): in whom though now ye see Him not, yet believing (with this word the present condition of believers ends, and with the next the then state again begins), ye [then] rejoice (present participle, as before: in whom must be taken with believing, not with ye rejoice. The A. V. is ambiguous, it being undetermined to which of the two, "rejoicing" or "believe," in whom belongs) with joy unspeakable (ineffable, which cannot be spoken out, Rom. viii. 26) and [already] glorified (this word is the strongest testimony for the as-if-future sense which we have adopted and maintained for ye rejoice, both times. It fixes the reference of the verb to that time when hope shall have passed into enjoyment, and joy shall be crowned with glory. The meaning on the other interpretation is obliged to be weakened down to "joy bearing in itself glory," i.e. the high consciousness of glory. The A. V. "full of glory," is quite beside the meaning. It is no quality of the joy which is asserted, but a fact which has happened to it), receiving (the word here, as in other places where it occurs (see 2 Cor. v. 10; Eph. vi. 8; Col. iii. 25; ch. v. 4; 2 Pet. ii. 13), quite forbids the sense of "present realizing:" it betokens the ultimate reception of glory or condemnation from the Lord. Here it is "receiving [present], as you then, in a blessed eternity, will be receiving") the end of your faith (that, to which your faith ultimately looked forward: see Rom. vi. 21, 22), salvation of (your) souls (the great inclusive description of future blessedness: the soul being the central personality of the man).

10-12.] The weightiness of this salvation, as having been the object of earnest enquiry of prophets, by whom it was announced, and even of angels. 10.] Concerning which salvation (its time especially, as explained below, but its manner and issue also) sought earnestly and examined earnestly (so literally) prophets (not the prophets; the terms, prophets and angels, are both times generic, to exalt the greatness of the salvation. What follows limits the assertion, and defines the prophets intended. So Bengel: "The omission of the article here gives sublimity to the discourse, for it draws off the reader from the limited consideration of individuals to regard the genus to which they belonged: so in ver. 12, angels"), they who prophesied concerning the grace that was [destined] for you (in matter of fact, in God's purposes it was you, for whom the salvation was destined, though you as in-

"The former means, the very date itself: the latter, the kind of period, to be known by various events." Bengel) season was declaring (signifying, revealing) the Spirit of Christ which was in them (the Spirit of Christ, i. e. Christ's Spirit: the Spirit which Christ has and gives, being He who reveals all things relating to Christ and the purposes of the Father: see Matt. xi. 27; John xvi. 14, 15, which passages, though in their normal sense they apply to New Test. revelations, yet in their declarative and abstract truth regard the Spirit's office in all ages. See also Acts xvi. 7) testifying beforehand the sufferings regarding (spoken of with reference to; or, as before, 'destined for') Christ (it is disputed, whether this be meant of Christ individually, or of Christ mystically, including His Church. Our answer may be thus given. The expression is not indeed strictly parallel with that in Col. i. 24: see note there: but still the two are so far analogous that they may throw light one on the other. In both, as in ch. ii. 21, iii. 18, iv. 1, 13, v. 1, and in many other places where Christ's sufferings are spoken of, Christ is used without Jesus, not thereby precluding the personal designation of our Lord, but still carrying into prominence the official and mediatorial: and on this latter account, if the context seem to require it, including also the wider mystical sense in which Christ's sufferings are those of the whole aggregate of His spiritual body. The question for us then is, Does the context here require this latter extended meaning? And to this we must answer decidedly in the negative. The "things which have been now reported unto you by them that preached the gospel unto you," are the contents of the gospel history, the sufferings and triumphs of Christ. And it was of these as appointed for Him as means of bringing in the grace which was appointed for you, that the prophets testified beforehand, and the glories after these [sufferings] (on these glories, see ch. iii. 18, 22, ver. 1. "The glory of the Resurrection: the glory of the Ascension: the glory of the last judgment and heavenly kingdom." Bengel. If it be asked what prophets are meant, we may reply, the prophets generally. Of one of them, who did prophesy of the sufferings of Christ, and the glories after them, viz. Daniel, we have it related, that he "understood by books the number of the years" destined for the desolations of Jerusalem. And our Lord declared that many prophets and kings desired to see the things which his disciples saw, and saw them not): to whom (taking up again the prophets . .) it was revealed (how are these words to be taken? Does it was revealed (1) correspond to "searching, &c.," so as to signify that the revelation was the result of their search, or the answer to it? The difficulty in such a rendering would be, that in one instance only would this be true, viz. that of Daniel; and even in that, not strictly correspondent: whereas it is here predicated of the prophets generally. Most certainly it cannot be in any sense said of them, that the exact time of the fulfilment of their prophecies was revealed to them. Or does it (2) signify that just so much was revealed to them, as that their prophecies were not to be fulfilled in their own time, but in ours? This again would be objectionable, seeing a) that there would be nothing corresponding to it in prophetic history, with the sole exception of Daniel, as before; b) that it would rather indicate a stop and discouragement of their search, than its legitimate result. Add to this, that the cases in which St. Peter himself, in the Acts, cites the prophecies, shew how he intended this term "it was revealed" to be taken. E. g. he quotes Joel, Acts ii. 17, speaking of the things prophesied by him as to take place "in the last days:" he says of David, ver. 31, "Seeing before, he Still, both are one in design, and in the contents of their testimony. And both are here mentioned, to set before the readers their exceeding happiness, in being the favoured objects of the ministration of salvation by prophets and apostles alike), which things (viz. the things announced to you: not, as many, the future glories promised to us: see below) angels (generic, as “prophets” above: see there) desire to look into (literally, to stoop down and peer into. palities and powers in heavenly places is made known, by the Church, the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10. Hofmann remarks,—“Angels have only the contrast between good and evil, without the power of conversion from sin to righteousness. Being then witnesses of such conversion to God, they long to penetrate the knowledge of the means by which it is brought about. . . . They themselves are placed outside the scheme of salvation: therefore it is said that they desire to look into the facts of the apostolic preaching”).

On the figure, see Eph. vi. 14 ff.), being sober (Calvin explains it well: “He recommends not only temperance in meat and drink, but, more than this, spiritual sobriety—the putting a rein on all our senses, that they become not intoxicated with the allurements of this world”), hope perfectly (i. e. “without doubt or dejection, with full devotion of soul:” or, even better, “so, that nothing be wanting.” The A. 14—21.] SECOND EXHORTATION—TO OBEDIENCE, AND HOLINESS, AND REVERENCE. This exhortation is intimately connected with the former; but not therefore to be regarded as one and the same. Each of these is evolved regularly out of the last [see again ver. 22], but each is an advance onward through the cycle of Christian graces and dispositions. 14.]

As children of obedience (compare "children of wrath," Eph. ii. 3; "children of light," ib. v. 8; and esp. "the sons of disobedience," ib. v. 6; "children of the curse," 2 Pet. ii. 14. This mode of expression must be referred to the more vivid way of regarding things prevalent among the Orientals, which treats intimate connexion, derivation, and dependence, even in spiritual matters, as the relation of a child or a son. 'Children of disobedience' are accordingly those who belong to 'disobedience' as a child to its mother, to whom disobedience is become a nature, a ruling disposition. Hence the student may learn to rise above all such silly and shallow interpretations as that "children of obedience" is a Hebraism for "obedient children;"—so A. V. The depths of the sacred tongue were given us to descend into, not to bridge over), not conforming yourselves (the

This ignorance marks not only the period, but also the ground and element of these lusts prevailing in fashioning the life); nay rather (the word is stronger than merely 'but') after the pattern of (still carrying on the idea of conformity) that Holy One (the A. V. has given a mistaken and ungrammatical rendering of this clause) who called you, be ye yourselves also (the tense in the original sets forth the completeness with which this holiness is to be put on) holy in all (manner of, every instance of) behaviour (conversation, in the old sense of turning and walking about in life), 16.]

ment unto the Son, John v. 22: for this last fact of itself implies that the Father is the Judge, the fountain of judgment: as Didymus says here, "When the Son judgeth, it is the Father who judgeth") according to the work of each man (on the work Bengel strikingly remarks, "Of every one man there shall be but one work, good, or bad." See James i. 4; Gal. vi. 4. every man's, be he Jew or Gentile, high or low, rich or poor: thus by setting God's just judgment above all alike, His Majesty, as inculcating godly fear, is enhanced), behave (see on behaviour above) during the time of your sojourning (see note, Heb. xi. 9. The Christian, who calls God his Father, is in exile, tarrying in a strange country, while here on earth) in fear (how, it is asked, is this, seeing that "there is no fear in love: for perfect love casteth out fear: because feath hath torment" [1 John iv. 18]? (Ecumenius answers, that the fear here recommended is not the corrective fear, leading to repentance, but the perfected fear, which accompanies the Christian through his whole course. And Leighton beautifully says, "This fear is not cowardice: it doth not debase, but elevates the mind: for it drowns all lower fears, and begets true fortitude and courage to encounter all dangers for the sake of a good conscience and the obeying of God. The righteous is as bold as a lion, Prov. xxviii. 1. He dares do any thing, but offend God: and to dare to do that, is the greatest folly, and weakness, and baseness, in the world. From this fear have sprung all the generous resolutions, and patient sufferings of the saints and martyrs of God: because they durst not sin against Him, therefore they durst be imprisoned, and impoverished, and tortured, and die, for Him. Thus the prophet sets carnal and godly fear as opposite, and the one expelling the other, Isa. viii. 12, 13. And our Saviour, Luke xii. 4, 'Fear not them which kill the body, but fear Him, &c.' Fear not, but fear: and therefore fear, that you may not fear"): 18.] knowing (being aware: this argument enhances the duty of godly fear by the consideration of the inestimable price at which they were redeemed. This consideration is urged through vv. 18—21) that not (emphatic) with corruptible things, silver or gold, were ye redeemed (bought out of, by the payment of a ransom, presently to be specified: see 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23; Gal. iii. 13) out of your vain behaviour (way of life, which, when past, left no fruit behind it) delivered to you from your fathers ("One Father alone is to be imitated," says Bengel; "we find the same contrast in Matt. xxiii. 9." This again makes it probable that the persons here more especially addressed are Gentile Christians. The Apostle himself, a Jew, would hardly speak of the vain ungodly lives of Jews as delivered to them from their fathers, without more explanation), but with precious blood, as of a lamb blameless and spotless (see Exod. xii. 5; Levit. xii. 20), [even the blood] of Christ (the other construction, adopted by the A. V., and many Commentators,—"but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb, &c." is legitimate; but I prefer the above, as bringing forward the precious blood in contrast to the corruptible things, and then explaining the word precious by a climax, finding its highest point in even of Christ.

The question, with what particular lamb Christ is here compared, will be found discussed in the main on John i. 29. Our reply here unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently: <sup>23</sup> being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever. <sup>24</sup> For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away: <sup>25</sup> but the word of the Lord endureth for ever. And this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you.

II. <sup>1</sup> Wherefore laying unfeigned brotherly love (love of Christians towards one another), love one another from the heart earnestly (the heart is the seat of the affections: let the love come straight and pure from thence, not short of it, from any secondary purpose as its origin. Intently would exactly give the sense of the adverb: with the energies on the stretch):

23.] Ground of the exhortation, carried up further than the act of purifying above, to the state of the new life of which that was an act; even to the beginning of that new life in their regeneration by the divine word. And the begetting cause of this new birth being God's living and imperishable word, from that fact come in new considerations, enforcing that pure love which belongs not to a transitory and shifting, but to an eternal and abiding state. Being born again, not of (out of, as origin) corruptible seed, but incorruptible, by means of (not "out of," this time. The word of God is not the begetting principle itself, but only that by which the principle works: as it were the grain which is the vehicle of the mysterious germinating power. We are not regenerated out of, but through, or by means of, the word. But on the other hand, the word itself is no mere perishing vehicle; no mere sacramental symbol, lost in the using: but it lives by and with the divine principle of life which it conveys and expands, and abides for ever. The power of origination rests in God Himself, the Father, who begat us of his own will: the means of instrumentality move on and abide for ever) the word of God, living and abiding (that the two participles belong to the word, not to God, is decisively shewn by the sequel, where the abiding nature, not of God, but of the word of God, is set forth). 24.]

Because (Scripture proof that the word of God lives and abides, while all human instruments of birth, being flesh, pass away) all flesh is as (as is not found in the Old Test. text) grass, and all glory of it (whatever blooms up from the flesh, as the flower from the grass) as flower of grass. The grass was dried up (the past tense; the fact being related as in a tale; so in James i. 11), and the flower [thereof] fell away: but the word of the Lord (in the Septuagint version, as in the Hebrew, of our God: changed here probably on account of the application which follows) remaineth for ever. And (literally, but: it applies what has gone before: the contrast being between the general truth and the particular identification) this (word here spoken of) is the word which was preached to you (literally, which was evangelized unto you; i.e. which was preached to you in the declaration of the Gospel. The logical inference to be drawn is,—“and consequently the word preached to you is imperishable and eternal, and demands of you that you earnestly and intently follow up that new life which by it has been implanted in you.” Hence the connexion of ch. ii. 1—3).

The guileless disposition knows not envy), and all slanderings (2 Cor. xii. 20. Augustine says, "Malice is pleased with another's harm: envy is tormented with another's good: guile doubles the heart; flattery, the tongue: slander wounds the good fame"), 2.] as newborn babes (so the Rabbis called their converts and scholars), long after the spiritual (I thus render, for want of a better and more distinctive word. The original term is the same as that rendered rational (A. V. "reasonable") in Rom. xii. 1: and its intent is, to distinguish the milk spoken of from mere fleshly milk, and to shew that it is spoken figuratively and spiritually: that milk of the soul, not of the body,—milk to be imbibed by the mental faculties. Our English is too poor in psychological distinctions, to be able to express it by any appropriate adjective: "reasonable" is decidedly wrong, as A. V. in Rom.; and "of the word," as A. V., here, after Beza, is just as bad) guileless (not, "unadulterated," in contrast to less pure human teachings: but, in contrast to "guile" above, "that is without guile," has no by-ends, no one purpose but to nourish and benefit the soul) milk (not here in contrast, as in 1 Cor. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12, 13, to strong meat: but simply in reference to its nourishing qualities), that on it ye may grow (properly passive: be nourished up) unto salvation (the growth is the measure of the fulness of that—not only rescue from destruction, but—positive blessedness, which is implied in salvation: see on the word above, ch. i. 5): 3.] if, that is (if so be expresses the same, viz. that the necessary condition of the above exhortation is assumed as having place in the readers), ye (have) tasted (the infant once put to the breast desires it again: the Apostle appeals to this their first taste as an incentive to subsequent ones) that (the formula is from the well-known and beautiful Ps. xxxiv.) the Lord (as Calvin observes, not simply God is here meant, but God as He is revealed to us in the person of Christ) is good (perhaps the simplest meaning, as applied to meats and drinks, is here intended. The Vulgate renders it sweet).

Observe that no "as" must be supplied, as is done in A. V.: Christ is the stone: we do not come to Him as we come to a stone) living (this points not only to the figure being realized in a higher department of being than its natural one, but also to the fact of the Lord being alive from the dead), by men indeed rejected, but in the sight and precious, <sup>5</sup> ye also, as <sup>the</sup> lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. <sup>6</sup> Wherefore also it is contained in the scripture, Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded. <sup>7</sup> Unto you therefore which believe he is precious: but unto them which be disobedient, the

of God (with God, God being judge) chosen (selected, chosen out), had in honour (see below, on ver. 6), be ye also as living (see above) stones built up (on the dispute whether the verb is indicative or imperative, see my Greek Test.) a spiritual house (equivalent to "temple," 1 Cor. iii. 16; Eph. ii. 21: as before, the stones are called living, and the house spiritual, not merely to signify that they are not dead stones, and the house not a material one, but on account of the life which Christians derive from Christ, the living Stone, and of the service which they render in virtue of being a body dwelt in by the Holy Spirit) for an holy priesthood (abstract, office of priesthood, including in itself the individual priests. Being God's spiritual temple, they form an holy priesthood to Him, approaching and serving before Him in virtue of that Living and Holy One, whose mystic Body they are, and in whom the Father is well pleased. And they need no other by whom to approach God: being all priests, they require not, nor admit of, any distinct body of men among themselves specially called priests, nearer to God than themselves. Nowhere is this more clearly declared by inference, than here) to offer up (no habitual offering, as in rite or festival, is meant, but the one, once-for-all devotion of the body, as in Rom. xii. 1, to God as His) spiritual sacrifices (compare especially Heb. xiii. 15, 16. Spiritual, because as the temple, as the priests, as the God, so the offering. It is this, rather than any distinction from the Old Test. sacrifices, that is pointed at) acceptable to God through Jesus Christ (these last words may be joined, either 1) with "acceptable," or 2) with "to offer up." This latter has for it the analogy of Heb. xiii. 15, "By Him therefore let us offer, &c.," and is much to be preferred. The introduction of the words "through Jesus Christ" as a mere appendage of "acceptable" would not satisfy the weighty character of the words, nay, would seem to put them in the wrong place, seeing that not merely the acceptability, but the very existence, and possibility of offering of those sacrifices depends on the mediation of the great High Priest).

6.] The exhortation of the previous verses is substantiated in its form and its assertions by Old Test. prophecy. Because (i. e. the aforesaid is so, on the ground of Scripture) it is contained in Scripture, Behold, I place in Zion a chief corner stone, chosen, had in honour: and he that believeth on Him (or, 'it': this addition is not in the passage cited) shall not be ashamed.

7, 8.] Appropriation of the honour implied in the last clause to believers: and per contra to unbelievers, of another and opposite effect of the exaltation of this corner-stone. Unto you then (inference from the last words, "he that believeth on Him shall not be ashamed") is the honour (belonging to the Stone itself, with which you are united in the building: the honour implied in the "shall not be ashamed," said of those who believe on Him. It is altogether beside the purpose to understand 'Christ,' or 'the Stone,' as the subject, and render as A. V., "He is precious," making "the honour" predicate instead of subject) who believe: but to the disobedient (not, the unbelieving: see Heb. iii. 18, note. Unbelief is the root of disobedience: but it is the manner of Scripture, to follow it out into disobedience, its invariable effect, when spoken of in contrast to faith. What follows is in the form of another quotation, or rather combination of quotations: the first from Ps. cxviii. 22), the stone which the builders rejected, this has become for a (has been made into a) head corner stone (this is true with regard to believers also: but to them it is grace and glory, to these it is terror and destruction), and a stone of stumbling and rock of offence (second quotation from Isa. viii. 14. This stumbling is not mere mental offence, which e. g. they take at the preaching of the Cross; but the "stumbling upon the dark mountains" of Jer. xiii. 16: see Prov. iv. 19; Dan. xi. 19:—the eternal disgrace and ruin which forms the contrast to "honour" above. See, on the "rock of offence," Matt. xvi. 23: where we find that the very expression carries a reminiscence of Peter's own days of unbelief when he was an offence,—he, the stone, petros,—to his Lord), who stumble, being disobedient to the word (thus, and not as A. V., is the construction), for which (thing, fact, viz., their whole moral course of delinquency and the stumbling at the end of it) they were also (besides that they reach it, there is another consideration) appointed (set where they are, or were; viz. by Him who set above [it is the same word in the original] the stone of stumbling).

God. But ye (emphatic) are a chosen generation, a kingly priesthood (the expression is from the Septuagint version of Ex. xix. 6. Compare Rev. i. 6, and v. 10. In the New Test. church, these two elements, the kingship and the priesthood, are united in every individual believer, as in our great Head, Jesus Christ, who alone unites them in the Old Test. church; the two coexisting, but never except in the case of Melchisedek His foretype, united in the same Person), an holy nation (also from Exod. xix. 6, God's declaration at Sinai respecting Israel), a people for acquisition (so literally: i. e. peculiarly God's own, as interpreted by what follows in the place of Isaiah referred to, as well as here. There it stands, in the Septuagint version, "my people whom I acquired for myself to shew forth my virtues." In the place of Exodus which was before quoted, ch. xix. 5, we read in the Septuagint version, "ye shall be to me a peculiar (acquired) people from all the nations." In Acts xx. 28, "the Church of God which He purchased by His own blood," the word rendered 'purchased' is 'acquired,' as here. See also Deut. vii. 6); that ye may tell out the virtues (i. e. gracious dealings, excellent and glorious attributes: see Isa. above. Christian life only; but must import that light of God's own Presence and Being, after which our walking in light is to be fashioned: the light to which St. John alludes, when he says, if we walk in the light, as He is in the light. "It is wonderful," says De Wette, "just as to one coming out of long darkness the light of day would be wonderful." The figure of the corner-stone has not quite passed away from the Apostle's mind: in the end of the prophecy concerning which he speaks, we read, Ps. cxviii. 23 [Matt. xxi. 42], "This is the Lord's doing, and it was wonderful in our eyes": who (contrast between their former and present states) were once no people (the Apostle is again citing, or rather clothing that which he has to write in, Old Test. words: see Hos. ii. 23), but [are] now the people of God (these words apply most properly to Gentile Christians, although spoken in the prophecy of Jews. St. Paul thus uses them, Rom. ix. 25; and it is not impossible that that passage may have been in St. Peter's mind), who were unpitied (of God: the clauses here and above are not merely negatives, but contraries: not "who had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy," as A. V., indicating a mere change of time in order of progress, but who were unpitied, objects of aversion and wrath), but now have obtained compassion (the past tense has a fine and delicate force which cannot be given in a version: who were men who [have received no pity], but now men who [received pity], viz. when God called you by Christ).

11—CHAP. IV. 6.] Exhortations to walk christianly and worthily towards and among those without who speak and act in a hostile manner. Hitherto we have seen them exhorted to walk worthily of their calling as distinguished from their own former walk: now the Apostle exhorts them to glorify God before an ungodly and persecuting world.

negative, exhorts to abstinence from fleshly lusts: ver. 12, positive, to cause the unconverted Gentiles around, by their fair Christian walk, to glorify God. Beloved (as this word is only found once again in this Epistle, ch. iv. 12, we may apply to it Wiesinger's remark, "The seldomer our Apostle uses this endearing term, the weightier it is where it does occur as the opening of a hortatory discourse"), I exhort you as sojourners (see Eph. ii. 19 and note) and strangers (see on ch. i. 1. This primary and literal meaning of the word is probably the uppermost one here, seeing that the Apostle is speaking of behaviour among the Gentiles. Still, from the more general reference of this first exhortation, the other and wider reference, that the sons of God wherever they maybe on earth, are strangers to the world, must not be left out of sight. These words, "as sojourners and strangers," belong, not to "I beseech you," as in the A. V., but to abstain. They form the ground why the readers should abstain, not why the Writer should exhort) to abstain from the carnal lusts (see Eph. ii. 3; 2 Pet. ii. 18; Tit. ii. 12. Here, it is, from the context, the walking and acting in the indulgence of these lusts which the Apostle is forbidding. See them enumerated in Gal. v. 19—21), the which (this expression gathers up into a class the lusts, and asserts it of all of them, that they war against the soul: thus rendering a reason) war (see James iv. 1; Rom. vii. 23) against the soul (the man's personal immortal part, as opposed to his body, his members in which the lusts war, is held in suspension between influences from above and influences from beneath: drawn up and saved, or drawn down and ruined. And among its adversaries are these fleshly lusts, warring against it to its ruin); 12.] positive result of this abstinence, and its important fruit: —having your behaviour among the Gen- tiles comely (as over against the rain-behaviour of the Gentiles, ch. i. 18. Compare ch. iii. 16), that (aim of the preceding) in the matter in which (not 'whereas,' as A. V. The sense is, "that that conduct, which was to them an occasion of speaking against you as evil-doers, may by your good works become to them an occasion of glorifying God." And "that, in which," will be in fact your whole Christian life) they speak against you as evil-doers (often the Christians would be compelled to diverge from heathen customs and even to break human laws, and thus would incur the imputation of malefactors), they may, on the ground of your good works, being spectators of them (contrast to the ignorance assumed below, ver. 15), glorify God in [the] day of visitation (i. e. the day when God visits, — Luke i. 68, 78; Acts xv. 14, — mankind with His offers of mercy and grace: our Lord says of Jerusalem, Luke xix. 44, "Thou knewest not the day of thy visitation." The word has been variously understood: the Fathers generally, and some moderns, explain it as above: others think that the day of inquisition before earthly magistrates is meant. Bede and others understand it of the day of judgment. But the former sense is far preferable on account of usage, and for its fitness in the context).

13.] Be subjected (so literally: be in a condition of having been subjected) to every human institution (such, and not "every human creature," as some hold. The latter would stultify what follows: for it is not to the king as a man, but to the king as a human institution, that we are to be subject. It is no objection to this command, that all powers are ordained of God: for that consideration does not come into notice in these words, but in those which follow, "for the Lord's sake." Here, it is the lower side of such institutions, the fact of their being ordained and upheld by men, that is brought into sight) for the Lord's sake (i. e. Christ's: "the Lord" with St. Peter, except in Old Test. citations, is always our Lord. And here there is additional reason, for that He, the Head of all principality and power, is yet in us his members subject to them, until the day when all shall be put under His feet): whether to king (general, — but, from the nature of the case as regarded those to whom the Epistle is addressed, here the Roman Emperor) as supereminent (not ruled by any other human power), or to governors (of the provinces, sent by Cæsar) as to men sent (in the habit of being sent, — sent from time to time) through him (the king, not the Lord, as some, and Calvin very positively. But there can be little doubt that he is wrong. For first the analogy of the clauses shews that the grounds of obedience in each case, all being alike for the Lord's sake, belong to the actually existing rights of power in that case. The king is supreme, in his own right: governors rule by delegation from the king. Then the right understanding of "for the Lord's sake," as applying to all, forbids this view. For thus we should obey the king as eminent, no mention of the Lord being made, whereas rulers are to be obeyed as sent by the Lord) for (to bring about) vengeance on evil-doers, and praise of well-doers.

purpose announced in ver. 12) so (after this manner, in this direction and wise: viz. as follows) is ('se trouve') the will (thing willed, concrete result of the will) of God, that doing good (so literally, the participle carrying the reason with it: by doing good) ye put to silence the ignorance (not simply ignorance of this or that fact, but a state of lack of knowledge or understanding, habitual ignorance. This state is here introduced as speaking, "having [as Wiesinger] ever its mouth open rather than its eyes," ready to cry out upon any mere appearance of things as misunderstood by it) of the foolish men (above designated; those viz. who speak against you as evil-doers: not, "of foolish men" in general, as A. V.). <sup>16.</sup> The connexion is somewhat doubtful. Chrysostom and others join as free with "submit yourselves," above, ver. 13:—Bede, Luther, Calvin, and others, with the last clause, "that with well doing, &c." ver. 15: Steiger, Huther, with the following, ver. 17. This latter seems quite untenable, as carrying no application on from ver. 16 to ver. 17. No one would think of pleading his freedom as an excuse for not honouring all, or for not loving the brethren, or for not fearing God: or indeed for not, in some sense, honouring the King. But in a matter of subjection, such freedom might be and often is made a cloke for disobedience. Connecting then as free with what has preceded, which of the other connexions are we to take? That with "submit yourselves" seems too distant: it may certainly be said that ver. 17 brings in again the general duty in its most simple form: but even thus we can hardly account for the parenthetical ver. 15, so unparenthetical in its aspect and construction. Whereas if we join "as free" to ver. 15, we obtain, as Wiesinger well argues, an explanation which that verse seems to need,—for it is almost a truism that we are to accomplish the putting to silence by well doing, unless some explanation be given of the particular circumstances under which this is to take place.—I regard then ver. 16 as an explanation of ver. 15. As free (children of God, His family and people, His kingly priesthood: not merely free from the law, or free from sin, or free from earthly subjection, but generally and abstractedly free—Christ's freed-men) and not as having your freedom [for] a veil of your evil intent (of the evil intent which using your freedom as a veil would necessarily presuppose), but as God's (emphatic) servants (and therefore bound to submit yourselves to that which God ordains).

<sup>17.</sup> A pithy general statement (see below) of the whole department of Christian duty of which the Apostle is now speaking: then a note of transition, by the three following commands, to the next paragraph, where he severs the general into the special duties. Give honour to all men (i. e. by the force of the original, to each man according as the case, which requires it, arises: "in every case render promptly every man's due," Rom. xiii. 7. So that the distinction between this and "honour" again expressed below is a clear one: see there. And by this force of the word used, this first precept assumes a place of general and wide-reaching reference, which then is severed by the three following commands into three great branches, before the relations of ordinary life are introduced ver. 18, with participial forms). Love (as your habit of mind and act) the brotherhood (the aggregate of the brethren), fear God, honour (both these latter as continuing habits, frames of mind and courses of action) the king.

<sup>19, 20.</sup> Reason for being subject to the perverse: that it is well pleasing to God when we suffer for well-doing. For this is thankworthy (as in Luke vi. 32, where the very same word is used, "If ye love them which love you, what thank have ye?" i. e. what recognition at God's hand in the day when He will come, and His reward with Him? It is said of something, to do or suffer which is out of, beyond, the ordinary course of what might have been expected. The A.V. has hit the meaning very well), if on account of consciousness of God (realization in a man's inner being, of God's presence and relation to himself: so we have "conscience of sins," Heb. x. 2) any one endures (as a superimposed burden, but here induced perhaps by the idea of subjection which is dominant throughout) tribulations (things which bring grief), suffering wrongfully

What credit is due...? Matt. v. 47), if doing wrong and being buffeted (the participles are in close logical connexion, and both of them describe enduring habit, not the occurrence merely of one such case. "When ye be buffeted for your faults," A.V., is somewhat too wide: "When ye do wrong and are buffeted for it," expresses the Greek more closely. Buffeted is here perhaps in the literal sense: receive blows, as was the wont with slaves), ye shall endure it (not, as De Wette, with only "the reluctant dull endurance of a criminal who cannot avoid his punishment:" this mars the hypothesis, which requires that the same kind of endurance should belong to both its sides, the only difference being in suffering justly and unjustly. So that "endure" must carry the sense of patient endurance: as A.V., "ye shall take it patiently")? but if well-doing and suffering [for it] (these last words are amply justified by the logical connexion of the participles, see above) ye shall endure it [it is glory] (with the reading adopted, it becomes necessary to supply, mentally at least, some such words): for this is thankworthy (see above; it is the same word as there, and never ought to have been altered by the A.V. to acceptable, which is quite another thing) with (in the estimation of God. <sup>21.</sup> For (proof that undeserved

Rather would I supply an object out of the being reviled and suffering, foregoing, either, with Huther and Wiesinger, "His reproaches and sufferings," or, which seems to me better, "those who inflicted them:" perhaps not without reference to "Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do") to Him that judgeth (whose office it is to judge) righteously (i. e. the Father: designated in ch. i. 17 as "He that judgeth without respect of persons." It is a word belonging to sacrifice, and not to be dissociated from it. But the most likely account of the expression is, that the Apostle transfers the well-known name of the elders of the churches, Episcopoi, to the great Head of the Church, of whom they were all the servants and representatives. Wives are to pay this honour, by being, &c.) your own husbands (your own gives point to the obligation, but is without any distinctive emphasis: see the parallel place, Eph. v. 22, and note), that (if we render strictly the future which follows, we must make this that in English, into so that) even if (even if assumes as possible, the apparently exceptional case which may seem to justify the wives' disobedience) any (husbands) are disobedient to the word (in a state of unbelieving disobedience; most probably, though this is not directly nor necessarily assumed, heathens), they shall be won (converted to faith and obedience: made a gain for Christian love, and for Christ Himself. So Leighton: "A soul converted is gained to itself, gained to the pastor, or friend, or wife, or husband who sought it, and gained to Jesus Christ: added to His treasury, who thought not His own precious blood too dear to lay out for this gain") without word (without speech: without you, the wives, preaching to them, or exhorting them, but simply by your Christian behaviour. The rendering of the A. V., "without the word," is precluded, on account of the general improbability of such a saying, seeing that faith is grounded on hearing, and hearing on the word of God. Besides which, the wives' conversation, being a shewing forth of obedience to the word, could not be said to produce its effect without the word) by means of the behaviour of their wives; when they have beheld your chaste behaviour (chaste, in the largest sense, not with its proper reference only: modest and pure) coupled with fear (so the A. do these words allude? They appear to be a citation from Prov. iii. 25, where it is said to him that obeys the counsels of wisdom, "Be not afraid of sudden fear, nor of the desolation of the wicked when it cometh." If this be so, the fear spoken of is not subjective, "with any amazement," as A. V., but some external cause of terror. And such a meaning would suit very well with the context, in which as in ver. 14, the Apostle is often encouraging his readers to bear affliction and persecution cheerfully. So that we may interpret it with Estius, "which while ye do, there is no cause to fear any evil: as, that of displeasing your husbands by your chaste and holy lives: or, lest they should treat you servilely if you shew yourselves ready to obey: for we know the sex is liable to vain fears. And even if you have unkind husbands, try to appease them rather by silence and patience, than by many words." With regard to the much-disputed question whether by the preceding injunction all ornament of dress is forbidden, or only the making such ornament the adorning, it may safely be left to the Christian wisdom of believing women, to be not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is, in this as in other similar matters. Within the limits of propriety and decorum, the common usage is the rule. There is sin in singularity, both as ministering to pride in ourselves, and as giving offence to others and discommending our holy religion. As Leighton well says, "There may be in some an affected pride in the meanness of apparel; and in others, under either neat or rich attire, a very humble unaffected mind. . . ." Seneca says: "Great is he who enjoys his earthenware as if it were plate, and not less great is the man to whom all his plate is no

7.] Duty of husbands to their wives.

Ye husbands, in like manner (in like manner, i. e., there is a certain honour due to the wife, as to the husband and the master before. This again must be connected with the general precept in ii. 17), dwelling according to knowledge (in an intelligent and reasonable manner, well aware of the weakness spoken of below) with the feminine as with the weaker vessel (some, as the A. V., join these words with giving honour. But this mars the parallelism and the sense. For the Apostle prescribes two things: 1) consideration for the wife, as of the weaker sex: 2) honour for the wife, as a fellow-heir of the grace of life), giving (apportioning) honour as to those who are also (besides being your wives) fellow-inheritors (with you) of the grace of life (i. e. God's gracious gift of life eternal: ch. i. 4, 13 suffice to clear the meaning, the former explaining inheritance, the latter, grace): in order that your prayers be not hindered. The hindrance meant seems to be, that which would be occasioned by the man not giving his wife proper honour as a fellow-heir of the grace of life; in which case the peculiar promise of advantage in social united prayer would be lost: see Matt. xviii. 19. According to this view, the united prayers of man and wife are meant. And so most of the Commentators.

Finally, all [being] (the construction is still carried on from ch. ii. 17) of one mind, sympathizing (the meaning is not, as in A. V., confined to cases of sorrow: the "re-joining with them that do rejoice" is also included), loving the brethren, compassionate (towards the afflicted), humble-minded (the word forms a note of transition to the next verse: humility being essential both to true gentleness of love and to true patience under injuries): not giving back (in deeds) evil for evil [to others,] or reproach for reproach (in words): nay rather on the contrary, blessing (others). The word blessing, in A. V., is liable to be, and generally is, mistaken for the substantive "a blessing:" whereas it is the participle, as in our text): because to this end (viz. that which follows) ye were called (by God), that ye might inherit blessing (it is not in order to inherit a blessing that we must bless; but because our portion is, blessing: and the reasoning is much as in Eph. iv. 32, "forgiving one another, as God also in Christ forgave you").

10—12.] For (the above exhortations are impressed by a citation from Ps. xxxiv. 13—17. That the citation cannot apply directly to the last written words, is plain, by their necessarily referring to the future life, whereas the blessings promised in the Psalm as necessarily refer to the present. So that we must connect the citation mainly with the participle, "blessing them;" and if we take in the intermediate clause, it must be only secondarily, as connecting, generally, blessing with blessing) he who desireth to love life (the difficulties of the citation can hardly be brought before the English reader. I have discussed them in my Greek Test.), and to see (ref.) good days, let him refrain (the Psalm proceeds in the second person, "Refrain thy" . . .) his tongue (first come the sins of the tongue, then those of the conduct) from evil, and lips that they never speak (referring to single occasions, or better perhaps, to the whole life considered as one fact) deceit (i. e. speak one thing and mean another): moreover (brings up a new particular, belonging to a different sphere of conduct) let him turn away from (in act, that is) evil, and do good; let him seek peace, and pursue it (because it is not always to be found, and when not immediately found, may require diligent pursuit: compare Heb. xii. 14, and St. Paul's command, Rom. xii. 18. The ancient gloss is good: "let him search for peace as a thing hidden, and pursue it as a thing fugitive").

12.] The citation continued, and a reason given for the foregoing conditions of prosperity. Because the eyes of the Lord (Jehovah) are (directed in a favourable sense, for good) upon righteous men, and His ears (inclined) unto their supplication: but the face of the Lord is (directed, in an unfavourable sense,—for wrath) upon men doing evil things.

See our Lord's saying, Matt. v. 10), blessed are ye (this, that is, makes no exception to none harming you, but rather is a notable example of it). But ("he now teaches how suffering is to be borne so as to keep this blessedness unmarred," Bengel. The words are almost verbatim from Isa. viii. 12, 13) be not afraid with their terror (not, "afraid of," as A. V. terror is, as in the place quoted, "neither fear ye their fear," subjective. The command amounts to this, "be not affected in heart by the fear which they strive to inspire into you"), nor be troubled ("as the highest curse which the law threatens is a heart fearful and full of terror, Lev. xxvi. 36; Deut. xxviii. 65; so the highest good which Christ gained for us and offers us in the Gospel is a heart certified of the grace of God, and consequently tranquil in all adversities and dangers." Gerhard): nay, rather sanctify your hearts (in the Old Test. passage it is added, "and He shall [in the A. V. let Him] be your dread." "This addition is not made here, but instead, in your hearts, to bring out that the sanctifying must be perfected in the inner parts of a man, and so keep him from all false fear. As if he would say, Care only for this, that your heart may be a temple of Christ, in which becoming honour may be given to Him as Lord; then will nothing further disturb you: you have in Him all that you can need." Wiesinger) Christ as Lord (the expression "the Lord of hosts himself" in truth is changed in a Christian sense into Christ as Lord): [being] (so literally; continuing the same adjectival sentences as before) ready always for (i. e. to give) an answer (an apologetic justification, in the primitive Christian sense. This was most commonly given before official persons and on trial, but in the present case is expressly extended to every person and occasion) to every man that asketh of you a reason (a reasonable account) concerning the hope that is in you (the word hope is not put for the whole of the Christian's faith, but is to be taken strictly. In persecution, it is his hope especially which is put to the trial), but (makes a contrast to the readiness just inculcated: ready, but not over ready: see Luther, below) with meekness (see above, on ver. 4) and fear (this fear is not the fear of God exclusively, nor that of men, but the aspect of the mind as regards both: proper respect for man, and humble reverence of God. The case supposed would generally occur when some one invested with authority asked a reason; and the complexion of the answer to be given is taken from that circumstance. On the injunction, Luther says, speaking from his own experience at Worms and elsewhere, "Then must ye not answer with proud words, and bring out the matter with a defiance and with violence as if ye would tear up trees, but with such fear and lowliness as if ye stood before God's tribunal . . . so must thou stand in fear, and not rest on thine having a good conscience (viz. when you make your apology: "seeing that words without practice have but small weight, therefore he joins to a profession of faith a good conscience." Calvin. This is better, seeing that the same subject, that of behaviour under persecution, is afterwards carried on, ver. 17, than to regard these words as taking up the former part of ver. 15), that in the matter in which (see note on ch. ii. 12) ye are spoken against (the reading of the A. V., after many of our MSS., has come apparently from ch. ii. 12), they who traduce your good conversation (behaviour in life) in Christ (as Christians,—your whole life being in Christ, as its element: see 1 Cor. iv. 17; Col. ii. 6) may be ashamed.

17.] For (confirmation of the exhortation to a good conscience, above) it is better (we have had a similar argument in ch. ii. 19, 20, from which passage the sense of better here is made clear: there it is said of the suffering for well-doing, that it is thankworthy, that it is glory, that unto this ye were called) to suffer [for] (see ch. ii. 20, and the connexion as given there) doing well, if the will of God should will [it so] (Luther says beautifully, "Go thou forth in Faith and Love: cometh the Cross, then take it up; cometh it not, then seek it not"), than [for] doing ill.

18—22.] Establishment of the above position on the fact of Christ having Himself suffered, being righteous, and through death, even in death vanquishing the power of death, entered into His glory at God's right hand. 18.] Because (not 'for': it does not only render a reason, but lays down the reason why Christian suffering for well-doing is blessed) Christ also (as well as yourselves if ye be so called as to suffer) suffered for sins (the thought is somewhat similar to that in ch. ii. 21, but the intent of it different: there, it was as an example to us that the sufferings of Christ were adduced: here, it is as a proof of the blessedness and advantage of suffering for well-doing, that proof being closely applied to us by the fact that that suffering was undertaken on our behalf, and that blessedness is our salvation. The words for sins I distinctly hold, with Wiesinger, to come in, as a point of comparison, between Christ and ourselves, under the also, against most Commentators. Considering St. Peter's love of using the same term in two meanings, of which we have already had several examples, e.g. vv. 9, 14, 15, I have no hesitation in applying the suffering for sins the one time to Christ, the other to ourselves, though His suffering for sin, and ours, are two very different things. He, the sinless One, suffered for sins; as a sacrifice for sin, as a sinner, made sin for us, dying the death of a criminal: we, though not sinless, yet in our well-doing, are to suffer if God's will so will it, for sins,—for sins which we are supposed to have committed, and as sinners. To miss this, is to miss one of the cardinal points of the comparison) once ("from this once, through the also," as has been beautifully said, "a beam of comforting light falls on the sufferings of Christians." He suffered once: His sufferings are summed up and passed away: He shall suffer no more. And we are suffering "once:" it shall be soon so thought of and looked back upon. For this reason doubtless is the word inserted); a just person (just is purely predicative: not as A. V. 'the just,' which again loses the point of comparison) on behalf of unjust [persons] (this again, though the resembling tints are beginning somewhat to fade off, is another point of comparison: He suffered, just, righteous, for unjust ones: He represented, He was offered for, the unjust, the unrighteous: and so we in our turn, though in a far less deep and proper meaning, when we, being just [ver. 12], suffer as unjust, though not in any propitiatory sense for unjust. We have similar uncertainty and play of meaning where the same subject is treated, Rom. vi. 10, 11: it is said that Christ "died to sin," and "liveth to God;" and we are exhorted thus to count ourselves dead to sin, and living to God: where the two expressions, though they have a common meaning of small extent, are in their widest and most important references of necessity widely divergent), that (with this expression of purpose we leave the comparison, as far as suffering is concerned, returning to it presently for a moment with the fact of His being put to death, and pass up to the blessedness of His innocent suffering, and to that which makes it so glorious and precious to us, as the ground of all our blessedness in suffering) He might bring us near to God ("that He, Himself going to the Father, might bring us who had been alienated, justified, into heaven together with Himself, ver. 22, by the same steps as He trod, of humiliation and exaltation. From this word to ch. iv. 6, St. Peter unites together the course and procession of Christ and the faithful [in which course he himself also followed Christ, according to His prediction John xiii. 36], inserting also the unfaithfulness and punishment of some." Bengel), put to death (this participial clause gives the manner of that bringing us near to God) indeed in the flesh (of this there can be no doubt, and in this assertion there is no difficulty. in the flesh, in this region, under these conditions, the death on the cross was inflicted: His flesh, which was living flesh before, became dead flesh: Christ Jesus, the entire complex Person, consisting of body, soul, and spirit, was put to death in the flesh), but made alive [again] in the spirit (here there may seem to be difficulty: but the difficulty will vanish, if we guide ourselves simply and carefully by the former clause. As regarded the flesh, the Lord was put to death; as regarded the spirit, He was brought to life. His flesh was the subject, recipient, vehicle, of inflicted death; His Spirit was the subject, recipient, vehicle, of restored life. But here let us beware, and proceed cautiously. What is asserted is not that the flesh died and the Spirit was made alive; but that as to the flesh the Lord died, as to the Spirit, He was made alive. He, the God-man Christ Jesus, body and soul, ceased to live in the flesh, began to live in the Spirit; ceased to live a fleshly mortal life, began to live a spiritual resurrection life. His own Spirit never died, as the next verse shews us. "This is the meaning, that Christ by His sufferings was taken from the life which is flesh and blood, as a man on earth, living, walking, and standing in flesh and blood . . . and He is now placed in another life and made alive according to the Spirit, has passed into a spiritual and supernatural life, which includes in itself the whole life which Christ now has in soul and body, so that he has no longer a fleshly but a spiritual body." Luther. And Hofmann says, "It is the same who dies and the same who is again made alive, both times the whole Man Jesus, in body and soul. He ceases to live, in that that, which is to His Personality the medium of action, falls under death; and He begins again to live, in that He receives back this same for a medium of His action again. The life which fell under death was a fleshly life, that is, such a life as has its determination to the present condition of man's nature, to the externality of its mundane connexion. The life which was won back is a spiritual life, that is, such a life as has its determination from the Spirit, in which consists our inner connexion with God." It is impossible, throughout this difficult and most important passage, to report all the various shades of difference of opinion which even the greater expositors have given us. I shall indicate only those which are necessary to be mentioned as meanings to be distinguished from that which I advocate, or as errors likely to fall constantly under the eye of my readers. Of this latter class is the rendering of the A. V. here, "by the Spirit," which is wrong both grammatically and theologically): in which he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; <sup>20</sup> which sometime were disobedient, when once the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water.

(viz., in the spirit, according to which His Jew life was. In which, not by which: see below) He also went and preached (went, used of a local transference here, just as "is gone" [the same word], below in ver. 22: and preached, of a preaching good news, as in all other places of the New Test.) to the spirits in prison (the disembodied spirits, which were kept shut up [Jude 6; 2 Pet. ii. 4] in the place of the departed awaiting the final judgment: in Scheol, as the Jews called it); which were once disobedient (this clause is a secondary and dependent one, descriptive of the spirits intended: that they were those of men who were formerly disobedient), when (marks distinctively the time intended by the word once) the long-suffering of God was waiting (and this marks the period of their disobedience, viz. those 120 years of Gen. vi. 3) in the days of Noah, while the ark was being prepared, in which (by having entered into which) a few persons, that is, eight souls (individuals) were saved (from drowning) by water (not, "into which a few, &c. got safe through the water," which was not the fact. The water is in the Apostle's view, the medium of saving, inasmuch as it bore up the ark: see the next verse). So much for the interpretation of the detail of this passage; from which it will be seen that we have regarded it, in common with the majority of Commentators, as necessarily pointing to an event in our Lord's redemptive agency which happened, as regards time, in the order of the context here: and that that event was, His going (whether between His death and resurrection, or after the latter, will be presently discussed) to the place of custody of departed spirits, and there preaching to those spirits, which were formerly disobedient when God's long-suffering waited in the days of Noah. Thus far I conceive our passage stands committed: and I do not believe it possible to make it say less, or other, than this. What was the intent of that preaching, and what its effect, is not here revealed; the fact merely is stated. The statement of the fact, however, has been felt to be accompanied by such great difficulties, that other meanings have been sought for the passage than that which the words present at first sight. Expositors have endeavoured to remove the idea that the gospel was preached to the dead in Hades, either 1) by denying the reference to our Lord's descent thither at all, or 2) by admitting that, but supposing it to have had another purpose. I give, following the classification in Huther's note, an account of the principal upholders of these views. Under 1., I place all those who deny any reference to Christ's descent into Hades, distinguishing the minor differences between them as to what preaching is there indicated.

I. 1. Augustine, Bede, Thomas Aquinas, Lyra, Hammond, Beza, Scaliger, Leighton, &c., and recently Hofmann, maintain that the preaching mentioned was the preaching of righteousness by Noah to his contemporaries: that Noah thus preached not of himself, but by virtue of the Spirit of Christ inspiring him; and that thus his preaching was in fact a preaching by Christ in the Spirit. But this necessitates a forced interpretation of the words in prison; Augustine understanding by them, in the darkness of ignorance as in a prison: Beza, &c., that they are now in prison for their then unbelief. It must be evident to every unprejudiced reader, how alien such an interpretation is from the plain meaning and connexion of the words and clauses. Not a word is indicated by St. Peter on the very far-off lying allusion to the fact that the Spirit of Christ preached in Noah: not a word, here, on the fact that Noah himself preached to his contemporaries. Again, the same subject, Christ, runs through the whole, without a hint, that we are dealing with historical matter of fact, in some of the terms, as "suffered," "put to death," "made alive," and with recondite figure in others, as "went and preached." Again, whether we take the metaphorical prison of Augustine, which I suppose will hardly find any advocates, or the present being in prison of Beza, &c., it cannot surely be doubted that we are equally putting force on the Apostle's words, and that the spirits in prison must be taken as describing the local condition of the spirits at the time when the preaching took place. Moreover, went, as compared with ver. 22 (which Hofmann gets most lamely over, by saying that it presents no greater difficulty than the statement that Christ accompanied the Israelites through the wilderness in 1 Cor. x. 4: to which we may answer, If this were a plain statement, involving such an application of the world, we might then discuss the intelligibility of it)—the expression, were once disobedient, marked off as not belonging to the same time as the preaching, shew, as plainly as words can shew, that we are reading of some act of Christ which He then, at the time described, went and did, with reference to spirits who were, at some other time specified, in a certain state. And, which has not been sufficiently noticed, a crowning objection to this view is the use of the word spirits, connecting [wherein, i. e. in the spirit] our Lord's state with the state of those to whom He preached: a word only used of men when departed out of this life.

I. 2. Several Commentators, principally Socinian, but also Grotius and others, understand by the spirits in prison either the Gentiles, or the Jews (under the yoke of the law) and Gentiles (under the power of the devil) together, and by the word preached, the preaching of the Spirit of Christ by the Apostles. These expositors take the mention of the disobedient in Noah's time to be merely by way of sample of the disobedient in all time, or, at least, in the time when the Apostle was writing. As Luther well says, "How this interpretation heaps on caprice upon caprice, need not be shewn." I will add, that its supporters do not appear to attempt to justify it philologically, as indeed it is plain they cannot. Every word of every clause protests against it.

II. We now come to those who understand the passage of our Lord's descent into Hades, but, offended by the idea of the possibility of salvation being opened to spirits of the disobedient kept awaiting judgment, diverge from one another and from the straightforward explanation.

II. 1. Many understand the spirits in prison of souls awaiting condemnation, but explain preached of announcing, not salvation, but condemnation. But, besides that this verb, as remarked above, has, as applied to Christ and His Apostles, but the one meaning of preaching the good tidings of Salvation,—besides the utter superfluity of such a "preaching" to spirits already reserved to damnation,—what a context would such a meaning give, in the midst of a passage intended to convey consolation and encouragement by the blessed consequences of Christ's sufferings!

II. 2. Some of the Fathers, as Irenæus, Tertullian, Hippolytus,—the Schoolmen, Zwingle, Calvin, &c., explain preached rightly, of announcing salvation, but regard the spirits in prison as the spirits of the just, especially of the Old Test. saints. The most extraordinary instance of this class of interpreters is Calvin, who destroys his own explanation, by confessing that the Greek will not bear it.

II. 3. Estius, Bellarmine, Luther, Peter Martyr, Bengel, &c., assume that the words refer, not to all the unbelievers of Noah's time, but only to those who repented at the last moment when the flood was upon them.

II. 4. Athanasius, Ambrose, Erasmus, Calvin, hold both kinds of preaching, the evangelic to the spirits of the just, the damnatory to those of the disobedient.

One or two singular interpretations do not fall under any of the above classes: e. g. Marcion maintained that the preaching of Christ was to those whom the Old Test. calls ungodly, but who were in reality better than the Old Test. saints; Clement of Alexandria, that they were the just among the philosophers, who were nevertheless imprisoned under idolatry.

It remains that we should enquire, whether this preaching to the imprisoned spirits by our Lord, took place between His death and His resurrection, or after the latter. The answer will very much depend on the sense which we give to the words in which. The argument which Wiesinger so much insists on, that the clauses must come in chronological sequence, will not determine for us; because in which He also might very well be a

taking up again of in the Spirit, recapitulating some former act also done in the Spirit: "put to death in the flesh, but made alive in the Spirit,—that Spirit in which also, ere He was made alive with the full resurrection life, He &c." And this I incline to think the sense of the passage: in which referring not to the complex resurrection life, but properly and strictly to the spirit, in which the Lord never ceased to be, even when His complex life of body and soul was dissolved. When again Wiesinger says that went and preached cannot be understood of the time intermediate, because in no case can we think of our Lord's state in death in dualistic wise, so that while His body was held by the bands of death, His Spirit should be carrying on the Messianic work, —I answer, why not? Surely the reply to the penitent thief implies a going, and in that going a joy and triumph sufficient to be the subject of a consoling promise at that terrible moment. And might not the reasoning be turned, with as much propriety? Might not we say that it is impossible to conceive of our Lord during that time as other than employed in the spirit in which He continued, not to exist merely, but to live? That, granted that His dying words imply a special delivering of his Spirit into the hands of his Father, and by consequence, a resting of his Spirit in those Hands in the death-state,—yet must we not conceive of His Spirit as going thither, where "the righteous souls are in the hand of God?" And if so, who shall place a limit to His power or will to communicate with any departed spirits of whatever character? So that, while I would not say that the conditions of the passage are not satisfied by the supposition that the event happened after the Resurrection, I believe there can be no reason for saying that they are not, on the other hypothesis. And I own, that the in which also inclines me to this other. It seems most naturally to be taken as a resumptive explanation of in the Spirit, with a view to something (ver. 21) which is to follow; and the in, capable indeed of being otherwise explained, yet seems to favour this idea,—that the Lord was strictly speaking in the Spirit, when that happened which is related.

From all then which has been said, it will be gathered, that with the great majority of Commentators, ancient and modern, I understand these words to say, that our Lord, in His disembodied state, did go to the place of detention of departed spirits, and did there announce His work of redemption, preach salvation in fact, to the disembodied spirits of those who refused to obey the voice of God when the judgment of the flood was hanging over them. Why these rather than others are mentioned,—whether merely as a sample of the like gracious work on others, or for some special reason unimaginable by us, we cannot say. It is ours to deal with the plain words of Scripture, and to accept its revelations as far as vouchsafed to us. And they are vouchsafed to us to the utmost limit of legitimate inference from revealed facts. That inference every intelligent reader will draw from the fact here announced; it is not purgatory, it is not universal restitution; but it is one which throws blessed light on one of the darkest enigmas of the divine justice: the cases where the final doom seems infinitely out of proportion to the lapse which has incurred it. And as we cannot say to what other cases this preaching may have applied, so it would be presumption in us to limit its occurrence or its efficacy. The reason of mentioning here these sinners, above other sinners, appears to be, their connexion with the type of baptism which follows. If so, who shall say, that the blessed act was confined to them?

21, 22.] The persons and the things compared must be carefully borne in mind. The few in Noah's day were saved by water; we also are saved by water. The antitype to that water on which the ark floated, saving its inmates, is the water of baptism; but as ours is a spiritual, not a material rescue, so the antitype is not the washing of our flesh by that water,—the form in which it is applied to us, as the bearing up their ark was the form in which their water was applied to them,—but a far nobler thing, the clearness and purity of our inner consciousness towards God: and this saving power of the water of baptism in our case is by virtue of the resurrection and exaltation of Christ, into whose death and resurrection we are baptized. Thus by our very profession we are united to Him in sufferings as in glory.

 resurrection of Jesus Christ : 22 who

He through His innocent sufferings has glorified suffering and death, even in death working mercy, and now exalted as our Head above all principality and power. The course of thought is unusual, is startling, is mysterious; but it is not unaccountable, it is not arbitrary. From the mention of the spiritual nature of our Lord's resurrection life, arises the mention of His blessed employ even in that state of the pure spirit to which His sufferings brought Him: from that mention comes the connexion of a great type of that day of Noah with our share, by baptismal union with Christ, in His salvation and triumphs; by which thoughts the final point is reached, His utmost exaltation through suffering, our union with and following of Him. Having said thus much on the whole connexion, we can now go into the details.

21.] Which (viz. water: not baptism, which does not come in till the end of the clause: nor, the whole fact announced in ver. 20. The construction is somewhat involved by the close connexion of the thing signifying and the thing signified. The water to which which refers is not the water of Noah's flood, but water, generally, the common term between the type and antitype), the antitype [of that] (i. e. simply the corresponding particular in both cases: the word does not contain in itself any solution of the question which of the two, the type or that which is antitype to it, is the original: the same word, antitype, is used in Heb. ix. 24, where, from the context, the type is the primitive, the antitype the representative: here, from the context, it is vice versa: this need not however be expressed, but left to be understood), is now saving (the rescue not being as yet fully accomplished. We are as yet being saved by water) you also (as well as them. Then this assertion having been made, follows the parenthetical explanation, that the method of saving in the antitype is not material, as in the type), even baptism (not, the water of baptism: the parenthesis following is a kind of protest against such a rendering:—but, water, in the form of baptism, become to us baptism. Water is the common term: water saves in both cases. It saved them, becoming to them a means of floating their ark and bearing them harmless: it saves us, becoming to us baptism: and that baptism not material, but spiritual): not putting away of the filth of the flesh (i. e. "not fleshly putting away of filth." It is possible that the Apostle may have special reference to the unavailing nature of the Jewish washings, as Justin Martyr says, "What was the profit of that baptism which cleanses the flesh and body only? Be baptized in soul"), but enquiry of a good conscience after God (i. e. the seeking after God in a good and pure conscience, which is the aim and end of the Christian baptismal life. This is the sense of the Greek expression here, in the only other place where it occurs in Scripture, viz. 2 Kings xi. 7. On this view, the enquiry of a good conscience means,—the enquiry which a good conscience makes. Very various have been the interpretations. Some understand the questions used in baptism; others, the request of a good conscience; others, again, prayer to God for a good conscience. The objection to all these is, that they do not justify the expression as applied to the saving force of baptism; as indeed neither entirely does the meaning which I have given above: but where all explanations were unsatisfactory, I thought it best to adopt one which strictly keeps to the Scripture usage of the words, being at the same time full as good as any of the others in its contextual application. The rendering of the A. V., the answer of a good conscience, is entirely unjustifiable, in fact is a pure invention, the word bearing no such meaning),—by means of the resurrection of Jesus Christ (with what are these words to be joined? Grotius, with others, connects them with the immediately preceding. So also Hofmann, saying, "By means of the resurrection of Christ, as the removal of sin once for all for all mankind, it is, that in baptism the prayer for a good conscience is directed to God." But as Wiesinger objects, it is surely allotting too insignificant a part to these words, to make them merely assign the method in which the prayer is heard. Most Commentators have joined them with saves, regarding the intervening sentence as parenthetical. Thus taken, the words refer back to "being made alive in the Spirit" in ver. 18, conducting on the course of thought with regard to Christ, and to ourselves: His resurrection, and entrance into His

And thus is announced the glorious completion of the result of Christ's voluntary and innocent sufferings: glorious for Himself, and glorious for us, who are by baptism united to Him. And now the practical inference for us follows.

CHAP. IV. 1—6.] Exhortation, after the forecited example of Christ's sufferings, to entire separation from the ungodly Gentile world. This passage closes the set of exhortations which began at ch. ii. 11, with reference to behaviour towards the heathen world around: and with ch. iv. 7, begins a new and concluding set, no longer regarding the world without. Christ then having suffered in the flesh (see on this above, ch. iii. 18. This conclusion takes up again the words "Because Christ also suffered" there, which led to the enlarging on the result of those His sufferings as regarded both Himself and us), do ye also arm yourselves with (put on as armour) the same mind (intent, resolution; viz., to suffer in the flesh, as He did. See this explanation justified in my Greek Test.); because (assigns a reason for the expression just used, arm yourselves: "and ye will need this arming, because, the course of suffering according to the flesh which ye have to undergo ending in an entire freedom from sin, your warfare with sin must be begun and carried on from this time forward") he that hath suffered according to the flesh is made to cease from sin (he is, by the very fact of having thus suffered, brought to an end with sin—has no more to do with it: and by an inference, the suffering in the flesh, and the being made to cease from sin, are commensurate in their progress. On the sense, see Rom. vi. 7. Here too there is throughout a presupposition of our being united to the sufferings of Christ, not merely as regards ourselves, suffering in the flesh, but suffering by virtue of union with Him who suffered, and so divorced from all sin. That this sentence itself is general, and not to be understood in itself of Christ, is plain: equally plain that He is the person hinted at in the background, and with reference to whom the general truth is adduced. The general assertion itself, here and in Rom. vi. 7, rests on the fact that the flesh is the element of sin, and he that hath mortified it by suffering has in the same proportion got rid of sin); with a view (depends on "arm yourselves," the intermediate general sentence being parenthetical) no longer by the lusts of men (as your rule: what is called the normal dative: not as Wies., al., i. e. will of God (according to that which God wills, as your rule) to live the rest of your time in the flesh (compare ch. i. 17). For (follows: "I say, the rest of the time, for the past time surely, &c.") sufficient is the past time to have wrought out (the word used, and its tense, imply that the course is closed and done, and looked back on as a standing and accomplished fact) the will of the Gentiles (that which the Gentiles would have you do. The Gentiles, used not of any national distinction, but of heathens as distinguished from Christians, shews that the majority of the readers of the Epistle had been Gentiles, among these gentiles, themselves), walking as ye have done in lasciviousnesses (plural, out-breaks of lasciviousness), lusts (here perhaps not general, as in ver. 2, but particular lusts of uncleanness), wine-bibbings, revellings, drinking-bouts, and nefarious idolatries (I may remark as against the view that this Epistle was written to Jews, that this passage cannot be explained on that supposition. The Jews certainly never went so far into Gentile abominations as to justify its assertions): at which (wherein, viz. at your having done with such practices, implied above. The aim of this verse is, that they might not be moved by the perverse judgments concerning them of these men. They must give offence to their former companions: for this there is no help) they are astonished (think it strange, as A. V.), that you run not with them (the idea is that of a multitude rushing on together) to (the direction and purpose of the confluence) the same slough (a sink, or slough, or puddle. On the whole the local meaning is to be preferred, on account of the figure in the previous verb) of profligacy, speaking evil of you (the early apologists testify abundantly to the fact, that the Christians were accused of all manner of crimes, and of haughtiness and hatred of their species): who (your blasphemers. The consideration is propounded for the comfort and stay of Christians unjustly slandered) shall render account to Him that is ready to judge (once for all, decisively) living and dead. For (assigns a reason for the judging the dead just mentioned) to this end to dead men also (as well as to living, which is the ordinary case: and carrying with it a climax,—“even to the dead”) was the gospel preached (when, and by Whom, see below), that they might indeed be judged according to men as regards the flesh, but might live on according to God as regards the spirit. In examining into the meaning of this difficult verse, one thing may be laid down at the outset, as certain on any sure principles of exposition; and thereby a whole class of interpretations removed out of our way. Seeing that for binds vv. 5 and 6 logically together, and that to dead men also distinctly takes up the to dead men before in this logical connexion, all interpretations must be false, which do not give to the words the dead in ver. 6 the same meaning as the dead in ver. 5: i. e. that of dead men, literally and simply so called: men who have died and are in their graves. This at once rids us of all the Commentators who interpret this second dead of the dead in trespasses and sins, as well as those who to gain this meaning here, distort dead in ver. 5 from its constant reference in that connexion to mean the spiritually dead, or the Gentiles. A second principle which we may lay down is this: that dead in ver. 6 must be kept as wide in its reference as dead in ver. 5: i. e. that it must not be interpreted as applying merely to the blasphemers of the Christians who should have died before the judgment, or merely to such blasphemed Christians themselves, as shall have then died, or merely to the spirits in prison of ch. iii. 19, but must be treated as a general assertion in the literal meaning of the word. It is quite impossible to put before the English reader the discussion on the different interpretations which have been given, as it mainly turns on considerations of the construction of the sentence in the original, but I may just say this much, that dead cannot mean "now dead," nor can the gospel was preached point to the time when the gospel was preached to them, before they died: nor again, can the Apostle's view be to comfort his readers in persecution and slander, by the thought that bodily death would not exempt their adversaries from the divine judgment. The view here adopted is, the persons pointed at are those spirits in prison to whom our Lord went and preached, ch. iii. 19. Our Lord is ready to judge the dead; and with reason; for even they have not been without opportunity of receiving his gospel: as the example which was adduced in ch. iii. 19 shews. For this end the gospel was preached even to the dead,—that they might—not indeed escape the universal judgment on human sin, which is physical death,—but, that they might be judged [be in the state of the completed sentence on sin, which is death after the flesh] according to [as] man as regards the flesh, but [notwithstanding] might live [of a state to continue] according to God [a life with God, and divine] as regards the spirit. And this interpretation I adopt, believing it to be the only one which satisfies the conditions of the sentence: which justifies the for as accounting for the judging the dead: the also, as taking up, and bringing into prominence and climax the dead: the term dead, as used in precisely the same sense as in the last verse, and contemporary with the verb which governs it: the statement, that the gospel was preached, as grounded on a previously-announced fact, ch. iii. 19: the aim and end introduced by the that, which on this, and on no other rendering, receives meaning and perspicuity. And so, in the main, with minor deviations, the more accurate of the modern Commentators.

7—V. 11.] General exhortations with reference to behaviour within the Christian body, in contemplation of the approaching end. This portion of the Epistle falls into three sections: 7—11, Christian and social duties, in consideration of the end being at hand: 12—19, Christian bearing of suffering, in the same consideration: v. 1—11, ecclesiastical and general mutual ministrations: passing off into fervent general exhortations and aspirations. 7.] But (the connexion is close with what had gone before: the being ready of ver. 5 is in the Apostle's mind: and he passes, with it before him, from considerations external to the church, to those affecting its internal condition) the end of all things is at hand (on this being the constant expectation of the apostolic age, see Acts i. 7, note: 1 Thess. iv. 15, note): be therefore of temperate mind (see note on 1 Tim. ii. 9), and be sober unto (with a view to) prayers, 8.] above all things (not placing love above prayer, but because all social life and duty must presuppose love as its necessary bond and condition) having your love towards one another intense (see ch. i. 22. He presupposes their love, and enjoins that it be fervent or intense): because love covereth a multitude of sins (from ref. Prov. x. 12, except that there it is "all sins." As to the meaning, the words here are used in a different reference from that in St. James, where see note. Here it is the hiding of offences [both from one another and in God's sight: see below] by mutual forbearance and forgiveness, which is meant. This has been recently denied by De Wette and Huther, the former understanding the sins rather as those of the Christian body, which mutual love keeps back from being committed, and the latter not excluding the other meaning. They would understand the words, that love causes God to overlook a multitude of sins. This they do partly on account of the word sins, which they maintain cannot well be applied to the mutual offences of common life [see however Matt. xviii. 15], and partly on account of "because," which seems to indicate some stimulus by which Christian love is recommended. And doubtless there is something in this latter consideration, especially when we remember that the nearness of the divine judgment is a pressing motive throughout these exhortations. I do not see why we should not take the saying in its widest reference, understanding it primarily perhaps of forgiveness, but then also of that prevention of sin by kindness of word and deed, and also that intercession for sin in prayer, which are the constant fruits of fervent love. It is a truth from which we need not shrink, that every sin which love hides from man's sight, is hidden in God's sight also. There is but one efficient cause of the hiding of sin: but mutual love applies that cause: draws the universal cover over the particular sin. This meaning, as long as it is not perverted into the thought that love towards others covers a man's own sin by his merits, need not and should not be excluded): — hospitable towards one another (see

Rom. xii. 13) without murmuring (see Phil. ii. 14, and note. The opposite to murmuring in hospitality is simple open-heartedness, Rom. xii. 8: the consequence of it, "hidden evil speaking, hateful reproaching with past favours," as Gerhard says here). 10.] And this is to be so, not merely in the interchange of this world's good offices, but also in the communication of the gifts of the Spirit, which are the common endowment of the whole body, individual Christians being only the stewards of them. Each man even as (in whatever quality and quantity: but the subsequent injunctions seem more to regard the quality than the quantity. It is otherwise in Eph. iv. 7; Rom. xii. 3. The as has no reference to the manner of reception) he received a gift of grace (see Rom. xii. 6 ff.; 1 Cor. xii. 4, 28; meaning, any one of the gifts known by that name), to each other ministering it (to the need of others; his store out of which he ministers being that gift thus bestowed upon him), as (being: or, as becometh: see ch. i. 14) good stewards (there is most likely a reference to our Lord's parable of the talents) of the various (or manifold: see this illustrated, 1 Cor. xii. 4; Matt. xxv. 15; Luke xix. 13) grace of God. 11.] And this both in speaking and acting. If any one speaketh (as a prophet or teacher, see 1 Cor. xii. 8, 10, where the several branches of this gift are laid out), speaking (as in the former construction) as oracles (not "the oracles;" the meaning is not, speaking in accord with Scripture, but, speaking what he does speak, as God's sayings, not his own: as a steward) of God: if any one ministereth (in Rom. xii. 8; 1 Cor. xii. 28, we have the several parts of this ministry laid out), [ministering] as (see above) out of (as his store and power of ministration)

Amen. <sup>12</sup> Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: <sup>13</sup> but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy. <sup>14</sup> If ye be re-

the power (thus to minister) which God bestoweth: that (aim and end of all this as of every act both of the Christian community and of the Christian man) in all things (the fact that all things are referred to God, and done as of and to Him, is His being glorified in the Christian church) God may be glorified through Jesus Christ ("as all benefits descend to us from God through Christ, so also all ought to be referred to the glory of God through Christ." Gerhard), to whom (viz. to God, as the main subject of the foregoing, and also because the words the glory refer back to may be glorified. The case is very similar to Heb. xiii. 21, where see note. See similar doxologies, ch. v. 11; Rom. xi. 36; Eph. iii. 21) is the glory and the might (exactly so in Rev. i. 6; see also ib. v. 13) to the ages of the ages (i. e., for ever and ever, see note, 1 Tim. i. 17). Amen (is not a note of conclusion, but of strong emotion of heart).

12—19.] Exhortations (see summary above) in reference to the trial of affliction which they were to undergo: and that, in view of the end of things. The section falls into three parts: 1) vv. 12, 13—these sufferings as participation in Christ's sufferings are to be rejoiced in, as in prospect of participation of His glory also; 2) 14—16—if really sufferings for Christ, the glory of Christ already rests on you: take care then that they be verily sufferings for Him; 3) 17, 18, these sufferings are a part of the coming judgment which begins at the house of God. Then ver. 19 concludes. This passage is no repetition of ch. iii. 13—iv.

6, which treated of their sufferings with reference to their inflictors: whereas this proceeds wholly on reference to a Christian's own inner hopes, and considerations within the church itself.

12, 13.] Beloved (so ch. ii. 11; here it begins an affectionate address, in which comfort and joy is about to be introduced), be not astonished at (see on ver. 4: think it not a thing alien from you, in which you are not at home. St. Peter himself was astonished, thought it strange at our Lord's sufferings, when he said, "This shall not be to Thee") the passing through the fire (literally, burning: in its later use, smelting, trying of metal by fire) which is taking place in your case for a trial to you, as if (explanatory of the "be not astonished," above) some strange thing were happening unto you (i. e., were falling by chance on you: opposed to what went before, "taking place for your trial;" i. e., done with a purpose, by One who knows how to serve that purpose): but in as far as (not "in that," "inasmuch as," A. V.) ye are partakers with the sufferings of Christ (i. e. have a share, in your own persons, of those sufferings which He personally bore: compare 2 Cor. iv. 10; Phil. iii. 10; Heb. xiii. 13, &c. It is not the sufferings of Christ mystical in His body the church [compare Col. i. 24] which are meant: in these the readers might bear their part, but could hardly be said to have part), rejoice; that (simply of the scope of that joy, as the preparation for what follows) ye may also at (in, i. e. indicating that at which or because of which the joy takes place) the revelation of His glory rejoice (the "rejoice" before was spoken of the habit of life; now of the single event of that day) exulting (with exultation; because that former joy here is mixed with grief and sadness.)

14—16.] See the summary above, at ver. 12. If ye are reproached in (i. e., in the matter of, for) the name of Christ (see Matt. v. 11, from which the words are adopted, as also ch. iii. 14. The word there added, "speaking falsely," comes below, vv. 15, 16. Bengel says, "People thought it a reproach to call any one a Christian, ver. 16." But probably the reference is more general, and Calvin is right: "He makes mention of reproaches because they bring with them more bitterness than loss of goods, or even torments and pains of the body; there being nothing which so much breaks noble minds." And in the name of Christ also must have a wider sense: on account of your confession of Christ in word and deed: compare Mark ix. 41), blessed are ye (ch. iii. 14: blessed, and that even now), because the Spirit of glory and that of God (the Apostle does not mean, by repeating the article, two different spirits, but identifies the same Spirit under two different denominations: the Spirit of glory, which is also the Spirit of God) resteth upon you (from Isa. xi. 2: on you, as on Him: compare also Numb. xi. 25, 26; 4 Kings ii. 15. It is possible that the clause which follows in the received text, may have fallen out by similarity of endings; but in judging of this as a likelihood, we must remember that not only the three great MSS. omit it, but so many of the ancient versions, as to make it very improbable that it has been thus overlooked: and its very appearance, to explain the words "of glory," is against it).

15, 16.] Negative and positive, resumptions and enlargements of the words, "in the name of Christ." In the name of Christ, I say: 15.] for let no one of you suffer (reproach or persecution: suffer in any way) as (being) a murderer or malefactor (as opposed to a well-doer, ch. iii. 17), or as (the repetition of "as" separates the following word from the foregoing, as belonging to a separate class) a prier into other men's matters.

16.] But if (he suffer) as (being) a Christian (the word appears here, as in Acts xxvi. 28, to be used as carrying contempt, from the mouth of an adversary), let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God in this name (viz. that of Christian: at, or in, the fact that he is counted worthy to suffer by such a name. This seems better than to take name as meaning "behalf," A. V., regard, matter, as most Commentators).

17—19.] See summary at ver. 12. The thought which lies at the root, is this: all men must come under the judgment of God. His own family He brings first under it, chastising them in this life: let then those who suffer for His sake glorify Him for it, as apprehending their part in His family, and as mindful of the terrible lot of those whom His judgment shall find impenitent and unchastised. It is this latter thought, the escape from the weight of God's hand [ch. v. 6], and not the thought of the terrible vengeance which God will take on their persecutors, which is adduced as the second ground

17.] Because (grounds the let him glorify, and the whole behaviour implied in it) it is the season (now: "the time is come," as A. V.) of the judgment beginning at (and proceeding onward from) the house of God (explained in the next clause to mean the church, the temple of living stones, the "spiritual house" of ch. ii. 5. The reference is to prophecies like Jer. xxv. 15 ff., especially ver. 29; xlix. 12: Ezek. ix. 6: Amos iii. 2. Wiesinger reminds us that it is hardly possible that the destruction of Jerusalem was past, when these words were written: if that had been so, it would hardly have been said, "time for judgment to begin"): but if first (it begin) at us (who are the house of God, see Heb. iii. 6. The argument, from the lesser to the greater, see expanded above. Compare our Lord's question, Luke xxiii. 31, "If they do these things in the case of the green tree, what must be done in the case of the dry?"'), what [will be] the end of them that disobey the gospel of God (the blessed tidings of the very God who is to judge them)? <sup>18.]</sup> And (the question of the last verse is again repeated under a well-known form, taken from the Old Test., which however casts solemn light on both members of the interrogation: explaining what is meant by judgment on God's people, and also by the end of the disobedient. The citation is almost verbatim from the Septuagint version, departing from the Hebrew text, which is as the A. V., "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth: much more the wicked and the sinner") if the righteous is (is being: or rather perhaps the present spoken of that which is to be) with difficulty saved (on account of the sharpness of the trial, and his own weakness. See Rev. v. 4, 5. The word scarcely does not induce any doubt as to the issue, only wonder: if we be righteous by faith in Christ, our salvation, however difficult and apparently impossible, is as certain as Christ's own triumph), the ungodly (the man who in his innermost heart cares not for God and turns not to Him) and sinner (he that is devoted to sin. The absence of a second article, and the singular verb, both shew, that the same person is meant by both), where shall he appear (so in Ps. i. 5: where shall he stand and find an abiding place in the judgment?)?

19.] Wherefore (general conclusion from vv. 17, 18. If the sufferings of Christians as Christians are a sign of God's favour towards them, in subjecting them to his judgments, with a view to their not perishing with the ungodly world, then have they every reason to trust Him in those sufferings, and to take comfort: continuing in that same well-doing which is their very element and condition) let also them who suffer (also, as well as all other persons) according to (in pursuit of, along the course of) the will of God (see on ch. iii. 17: here especially in reference to our ver. 17, seeing that it is God's will that judgment should begin at His house), commit (deliver [subjectively] into the hands of, and confidently leave) their souls (their personal safety and ultimate salvation, ver. 18) in (as clad in, accompanied with, subsisting and employed in) well-doing (as contrasted with the opposite characters in ver. 15. This title of God must not be understood of the second creation in the new birth).

CHAP. V. 1—11.] Last and hortatory portion of the Epistle; in which the word well-doing, ending (in the original) the former portion, is taken up and spread over various classes among the readers: thus vv. 1—1, he exhorts the leaders of the church; ver. 5, the younger members [see note there]; vv. 6—9, all in common. Then, vv. 10, 11, follows his general parting wish and ascription of praise to God.

1.] Elders therefore among you I exhort (the designation elders or presbyters here is evidently an official one [ver. 2], but at the same time reference to age is included: see ver. 5. The therefore takes up the above exhortation ch. iv. 19), who am a fellow-elder (with you: Bengel remarks, that "mutual exhortation among equals and colleagues is of great force"), and witness of the sufferings of Christ (not in the sense of Acts i. 8, 22, ii. 32, x. 39, &c.,—a witness to testify to by words,—nor as Heb. xii. 1; Acts xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13, xvii. 6, a witness, in bearing about in his own person,—nor both of these together;—but in the sense of an eye-witness, on the ground of which his apostolic testimony rested: I who say to you, "Christ suffered in the flesh," say this of sufferings which my own eyes saw. Thus this clause links on the following exhortation to the preceding portion of the Epistle concerning Christian suffering, and also tends to justify the therefore), who am also a partaker of the glory which is about to be revealed (I prefer to take this as an allusion to our Lord's own words John xiii. 36, "Thou shalt follow me afterwards," rather than regard it as alluding to the Transfiguration, as some, or to the certainty that those who suffer with Him will be glorified with Him. As bearing that promise, he came to them with great weight of authority as an exhorter—having seen the sufferings of which he speaks, and being himself an heir of that glory to which he points onwards),—tend (or keep. It is the same word as in John xxi. 16 [not 15 and 17]: see note there) the flock (the verb includes in one word the various offices of a shepherd; the leading, feeding, heeding) of God (see Acts xx. 28. The similitude is among the commonest in Scripture: see Jer. iii. 15, xxiii. 1—4; Ezek. xxxiv. 2 ff.; John x. 11 ff.) which is among you (he orders them to feed the flock of God, not generally, nor oecumenically, but locally, as far as concerned that part of it found among them) [, overseeing (it) (this word, "episcopountes," has perhaps been removed for ecclesiastical reasons, for fear presbyters should be supposed to be, as they really were, episcopoi, bishops)] not constrainedly ("so, as men do who would be of some other profession if they could afford it, and are consequently idle and cold-hearted in their work"), but willingly (out of love to the great Shepherd, and to the flock. The addition, "according to God," is curious, and not easily accounted for. It certainly does not, as Luther says, clear up the thought, but rather obscures it. The expression is seldom found; and never in the sense here required); nor yet (brings in a climax each time) with a view to base gain (see Isa. lvi. 11; Jer. vi. 13, viii. 10; Ezek. xxxiv. 2, 3, &c.; and Titus i. 7), but earnestly (prompted by a desire not of gain, but of good to the flock;—ready and enthusiastic, as [the illustration is Bede's] the children of Israel, and even the workmen, gave their services eagerly and gratuitously to build the tabernacle of old; nor yet as lording it over (using the rights of a lord for the diminution of the ruled and the exaltation of self. Christian rulers of the church are set over the church [1 Thess. v. 12; Rom. xii. 8], leaders [Luke xxii. 26], but not lords over it [Luke xxii. 25, 26]. One is their lord, and they are His ministering servants) the portions [entrusted to you] (so is the original word (clerus) understood by very many Commentators, and rightly, as is decided by the mention of the flock below. See this meaning defended in my Greek Test.), but becoming patterns of the flock (the tyrannizing could only apply to the portion over which their authority extended, but the good example would be seen and followed by the whole church: hence “your portions” in the prohibition, but “the flock” in the exhortation). And [then] when the chief Shepherd (see ch. ii. 25; Heb. xiii. 20: and compare Ezek. xxxiv. 15, 16, 23; Matt. xxv. 32) is manifested (used by St. Peter in a double reference, to Christ's first coming, and His second also: see ch. i. 20: so also by St. Paul, Col. iii. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16: by St. John, 1 John ii. 28, iii. 2, 5, 8. Here clearly of the second coming. It would not be plain, from this passage alone, whether St. Peter regarded the coming of the Lord as likely to occur in the life of these his readers, or not; but as interpreted by the analogy of his other expressions on the same subject, it would appear that he did), ye shall receive the amarantine (the adjective formed from amarantus, the everlasting, or unfading, flower. It does not here mean unfading, but must be rendered strictly, composed of that flower: the word in ch. i. 4 is a different form) crown (reff.) of His glory (or, of glory: but I prefer the other. That we shall share his glory, is a point constantly insisted on by St. Peter: see ver. 1, ch. iv. 13. i. 7: and above all, ver. 10 below. This idea reaches its highest in St. John, with whom the inner unity of the divine life with the life of Christ is all in all. Compare especially 1 John iii. 2 f.).

5—7.] Exhortation to the younger, and to all, to humility and trust in God.

5.] In like manner (i.e. ‘mutatis mutandis,’ in your turn: see ch. iii. 7: with the same recognition of your position and duties), ye younger, be subject to the elders (in what sense are we to take “younger” and “elders” here? One part of our answer will be very clear: that “elders” must be in the same sense as above, viz., in its official historical sense of presbyters in the church. This being so, we have now some clue to the meaning of “ye younger:” viz. that it cannot mean younger in age merely, though this, as regarded men, would generally be so, but that as the name elder had an official sense, of superintendents of the church, so younger likewise, of those who were the ruled, the disciples of the elders. Thus taken, it will mean here, the rest of the church, as opposed to the elders). Yea (the A. V. happily thus gives the sense, i.e., Why should I go on giving these specific injunctions, when one will cover them all?), all gird on humility one to another (an allusion to our Lord's action of girding Himself with a napkin in the servile ministrations of washing the disciples' feet: of which He himself said, that He had given them an example to do as He did. The impression made on St. Peter by this proof of his Master's love is thus beautifully shewn. The verb rendered gird on is variously interpreted. Its derivation is

The strong hand of God is laid on the afflicted and suffering, and it is for them to acknowledge it in lowliness of mind), that He may exalt you (the Apostle refers to the often repeated saying of our Lord, Matt. xxiii. 13, Luke xiv. 11, xviii. 14. The same is also found in the Old Test. Ps. xviii. 27; Prov. xxix. 23) in [the] time [appointed] (this humility implies patience, waiting God’s time. This again is an Old Test. citation, Ps. lv. 22. The expression shews that the anxiety was not a possible, but a present one; that the exhortation is addressed to men under sufferings. As to the word anxiety, we may remark, that it is the same root as that used in Matt. vi. 22, and signifies care by which the spirit is divided, part for God, part for unbelief; which is in fact an exalting self against Him) upon Him, because (seeing that: the justifying reason) He careth (this is not the same, nor a like word to that rendered anxiety above: and however much the run of the words to which we are accustomed is marred by the change, the two should in rendering be kept carefully distinct) for (about) you.

This sobriety of mind, as opposed to intoxication with anxieties of this life, is necessary to the firm resistance: only he who is sober stands firm), be watchful (can it be that Peter thought of his Lord’s “Were ye thus unable to watch with me one hour” on the fatal night when he denied Him?): your adversary (the omission of any casual particle makes the appeal livelier and more forcible, leaving the obvious connexion to be filled up by the reader) the devil as a roaring lion (“the devil is compared to a lion hungry and roaring for impatience of his hunger, because he insatiably seeks our destruction, and no prey satisfies him.” Gerhard) walketh about (compare Job i. 7, ii. 2), seeking whom to devour (namely, by assimilating to himself through commission

He who has begun grace with a view to glory, will not cut off grace till it be perfected in glory. See 1 Thess. ii. 12; 2 Thess. ii. 14) His eternal glory in Christ Jesus (this, "in Christ Jesus" belongs to "called," which has since been defined by the words following it. Christ Jesus is the element in which that calling took place), when ye have suffered a little

A speech worthy of Peter, the Rock; he is confirming his brethren." See Luke xxii. 32, Thou, when thou hast turned again, strengthen (the same word as here) thy brethren: 2 Tim. ii. 19). To Him (again emphatic: "that they might not claim any praise and glory to themselves," Gerhard) be (i. e. be ascribed: or, as ch. iv. 11, is, i. e. is due) the might (which has been shewn in this perfecting, confirming, strengthening, grounding you, and in all that those words imply as their ultimate result,—of victory and glory) to the ages of the ages. See further in the Introduction), as I reckon (indicates the Apostle's judgment concerning Silvanus, given, not in any disparagement of him, nor indicating that he was not known to St. Peter, but as fortifying him, in his mission to the churches addressed, with the Apostle's recommendation, over and above the acquaintance which the readers now already have had with him), I have written unto you (these words "unto you" are taken by some, as the A. V., as dependent on "faithful," which is harsh, and leaves the verb "I have written" without any object of address) in (literally, by means of,—as my vehicle of conveying my meaning) few words (this may perhaps refer to some more copious instructions which Silvanus was to give them by word of mouth: or may serve to fix their attention more pointedly on that which had been thus concisely said), exhorting (such in the main is the character of the Epistle) and giving my testimony that this (of which I have written to you; see below) is the true grace (as testified by the preaching of the Apostles to be covenanted and granted to them by God. This identification of the preached and written message with the true mind of God towards man, is not uncommon with our Apostle: e. g., ch. i. 12, 25 [ii. 10, 25]). The reason of this was not any difference, as some would have us believe, between the teachings of St. Peter and St. Paul, but the difficulty presented to the readers in the fact of the fiery trial of sufferings which they were passing through) of God, in which stand ye (the construction in the original is what is called pregnant; into which being admitted, stand in it. This is a short and earnest exhortation, containing in it the pith of what has been said by way of exhortation in the whole Epistle).

13.] She that is elected together with you in Babylon salutes you (who, or what is this? The great majority of Commentators understand it to mean a sister congregation, elect like yourselves, ch. i. 1. And this perhaps may be a legitimate interpretation. Still it seems hardly probable, that there should be joined together in the same sending of salutation, an abstraction, spoken of thus enigmatically, and a man, Mark my son, by name. No mention has occurred in the Epistle of the word church, to which reference might be made: if such reference be sought for, the dispersion, in ch. i. 1, is the only word suitable, and that could hardly be used of the congregation in any particular place. Finally, it seems to be required by the rules of analogy, that in an Epistle addressed to elect strangers or sojourners, individually, not aggregately, "she that is elected together with them," must be an individual person also. These considerations induce me to accede to the opinion of those, who recognize here the believing sister whom St. Peter led about, being his wife, 1 Cor. ix. 5: and to find, in the somewhat unusual periphrastic way of speaking of her, a confirmation of this view. Still, I own, the words "in Babylon" a little stagger me in this view. But it seems less forced than the other. On the question, what Babylon is intended, whether Rome, or the Chaldean capital, or some village in Egypt, see Introduction, § iv.), and Mark my son (perhaps, and so most have thought, the well-known Evangelist: perhaps the actual son of St. Peter, bearing this name. The fact of Peter taking refuge in the house of Mary the mother of John Mark (Acts xii. 2), casts hardly any weight on the side of the former interpretation: but it derives some probability from the circumstance that St. Mark is reported by Eusebius to have been the follower and disciple and interpreter of Peter, on the authority of Papias and Clement of Alexandria: and that Irenæus reports the same. The word "son" is understood either spiritually or literally, according as one or other of the above views is taken).

14.] Salute one another in (as the medium of salutation) a kiss of love (see on Rom. xvi. 16, where, as every where except here, "an holy kiss" is the expression). Peace be to you all that are in Christ (the concluding blessing of St. Paul is usually grace, not peace: see [Rom. xvi. 24] 1 Cor. xvi. 23; 2 Cor. xiii. 13; Gal. vi. 18; Eph. vi. 24 [where however "peace be to the brethren," &c. precedes]; Phil. iv. 23; Col. iv. 18; 1 Thess. v. 28; 2 Thess. iii. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 22; Titus iii. 15; Philem. 25 [Heb. xiii. 25]. Gerhard says well that the formula came into use from the salutation of Christ after the Resurrection. The blessing differs also from those in St. Paul, in the limitation implied by you all that are in Christ, whereas St. Paul has ever "with you all." Here it is, "Peace to you, I mean, all that are, and in as far as they are, in Christ;" in union and communion with Him. "That are in Christ" is quite in St. Paul's manner: compare Rom. viii. 8; xvi. 7; 2 Cor. v. 17. See also our ch. iii. 16; v. 10).

CHAP. I. 1, 2.] ADDRESS AND GREET-ING.

1.] Symeon (the form as belonging to our Apostle, is found, besides here, only in Acts xv. 14. Its occurrence is at all events a testimony in favour of the independence of the second Epistle.
It has not, in order to make the name uniform, been adapted to the first: which, considering that it refers to the first, is a note, however slight, on the side of its genuineness) Peter a servant (Rom. i. 1) and apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained (not got for themselves)
like precious faith (faith,—i. e. substance of truth believed: faith objective, not subjective,—of equal value: not, which confers equal right to God's kingdom, equal honour and glory. The A. V. has hit the meaning very happily by like precious. See 1 Pet. ii. 7) with us (apparently, in the first place, the Apostles:
but more probably, in a wider sense, the Jewish Christians, with whom the Gentiles had been admitted into the same covenant, and the inheritance of the like precious promises) in the righteousness of our God and [our] Saviour Jesus Christ (first, concerning the words, in the righteousness. Some Commentators take righteousness for an attribute of God, and "in"
as instrumental, by the righteousness, goodness, truth, of God: others understand it as the righteousness which God gives us, and Christ won for us, explaining "in" as with or by: but this is objectionable, seeing that righteousness comes by faith, not faith by righteousness.

The best explanation seems to me that "righteousness" here betokens the righteous dealing of God, corresponding to His attribute of righteousness, as opposed to respect of persons, and that the words are to be taken in close connexion with the foregoing, "in" being used of the conditional element, in which the obtaining like precious faith is grounded: so that the sense is, in His righteousness, which makes no difference between the one party and the other, God has given to you the like precious faith, as to us. The objection made to this, that thus the Epistle must be regarded as written to Gentile Christians, is not valid, or proves too much:
for at all events there must be two parties in view in the words "*like precious . . .
with us*," whatever these parties be.

Next, in the words, of our God and [our] Saviour Jesus Christ, I would interpret, as in Titus ii. 13 [where see note] our God of the Father, and [our] Saviour Jesus Christ of the Son. Here, there is the additional consideration in favour of this view, that the Two are distinguished most plainly in the next verse): 2.] Grace to peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord, <sup>3</sup> according as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and god-ledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue: <sup>4</sup> whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. <sup>5</sup> And beside this,

you and peace be multiplied (so in 1 Pet. i. 2: but further specified here by what follows) in (as the vehicle, or conditional element of the multiplication) the knowledge (properly, full, or ripe knowledge: but this can hardly be given in English without too strong a phrase) of God, and of Jesus our Lord (every unusual expression, like Jesus our Lord, occurring only Rom. iv. 24, should be noticed as a morsel of evidence to the independence of the Epistle).

3—11.] Exhortation to advance in the graces of the spiritual life: introduced (vv. 3, 4) by a consideration of the rich bestowal from God of all things belonging to that life by the knowledge of Him, and the aim of His promises, viz. that we should partake in the divine nature. 3.] Seeing that (the connexion with the greeting which precedes must not be broken: it is characteristic of this Epistle, to dilate further when the sense seems to have come to a close) His divine (the word rendered divine is peculiar, in the New Test., to this Epistle) power hath given us all things which are [requisite] for life and godliness (this word godliness is a mark of the later apostolic period) through (by means of, as the medium of attainment: "the knowledge of God is the beginning of life, John xvii. 3." Calvin) the knowledge (the same word as above) of Him that called us (i. e. of God, who is ever the Caller in the New Test.: see e. g. 1 Pet. ii. 9) by (of the instrument) His own glory and virtue (virtues are predicated of God in 1 Pet. ii. 9. Both substantives belong to God, not to us: we must not render, as in A. V., "called us to glory and virtue," of which meaning there is not a trace in either of the readings. Bengel seems to give the meaning well, "To glory must be referred those attributes of God which are natural, to virtue those which are called moral: both are, in their inmost nature, one." See Gal. i. 15), 4.] through which (His attributes and energies) He hath given to us (not as A. V., "are given," passive) the [or, His] greatest and precious promises (not, things promised), that by means of these (promises: i. e. their fulfilment) ye may become partakers of the divine nature (i. e. of that holiness, and truth, and love, and, in a word, perfection, which dwells in God, and in you by God dwelling in you), having escaped (a note of matter of fact, bringing out in this case the negative side of the Christian life, as the former clause did the positive:—"when ye have escaped") from the corruption (destruction of soul and body) which is in the world in (consisting in, as its element and ground) lust (Calvin says well: "This corruption he shews to be not in the elements which surround us, but in our own heart, because there reign the vicious and wicked affections, whose source and root he denotes by the word lust. This corruption then is so placed by him in the world, as to shew us that the world is in ourselves").

5—7.] Direct exhortation, consequent on vv. 3, 4, to progress in the spiritual life.

5.] And on this very account (the reason here being that stated in giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue: and to virtue knowledge; <sup>6</sup> and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; <sup>7</sup> and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity. <sup>8</sup> For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord for this reason, <sup>h</sup> giving on your <sup>h</sup> ch. iii. 18, part all diligence, provide, in [the exercise of] your faith, virtue; and in your virtue, <sup>i</sup> knowledge; <sup>6</sup> and <sup>i</sup> 1 Pet. iii. 7, in your knowledge, self-restraint; and in your self-restraint, patience; and in your patience, godliness; <sup>7</sup> and in your godliness, brotherly kindness; and <sup>k</sup> in your brotherly kindness, love. <sup>8</sup> For these things, being in you, and multiplying, render you not idle <sup>l</sup> nor yet unfruitful towards the perfect knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. <sup>k</sup> Gal. vi. 10, <sup>l</sup> 1 Thess. iii. 12, & v. 15, <sup>l</sup> 1 John iv. 21, <sup>l</sup> John xv. 2, <sup>l</sup> Titus iii. 14.

ver. 3, "seeing that, &c.," above: so that this forms a sort of termination to that sentence. The A. V. 'beside this' is entirely at fault) giving on your part (literally, introducing by the side of: i.e. besides those precious promises on God's part, bringing in on your part) all diligence, furnish (from the original meaning of the verb, to provide expenses for a chorus, it easily gets this of furnishing forth. And the construction and meaning of the following clauses is not as in the A. V., "add to" your faith, virtue, &c., but the word in is each time used of that which is assumed to be theirs, and the exhortation is, to take care that, in the exercise of that, the next step is developed), in your faith (Bengel remarks, "Faith is the gift of God: therefore we are not ordered to provide faith, but in our faith those fruits, seven of which are enumerated: faith leading the band, love closing it") virtue (best perhaps understood with Bengel as "strenuous tone and vigour of mind"); and in your virtue, knowledge (probably that practical discriminating knowledge, of which it is said Eph. v. 17, "Be not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is"); <sup>6</sup> and in your knowledge, self-restraint ("temperance" is perhaps now too much used of one sort only of self-restraint, fully to express the word. The connexion is: let such discriminating knowledge not be without its fruit, of steady holding in hand of the passions and tempers); and in your self-restraint, patient endurance (in afflictions and trials); and in your patient endurance, godliness (i.e. it is not to be mere brute Stoical endurance, but united with God-fearing and God-trusting); <sup>7</sup> and in your godliness, brotherly kindness (not suffering your godliness to be moroseness, nor a sullen solitary habit of life, but kind and generous and courteous); and in your brotherly kindness, love (universal kindness of thought, word, and act towards all: a catholic large-heartedness, not confining the spirit of brotherly kindness to brethren only, Matt. v. 46, 47. So that these two last correspond to the "love to one another and to all" of 1 Thess. iii. 12).

<sup>8, 9.</sup> Reasons for the foregoing exhortations: 1) positive, the advantage of these Christian graces in bringing forth fruit towards the mature knowledge of Christ: 2) negative, the disadvantage of their absence from the character.

<sup>8.</sup> For these things (the above-mentioned graces) being in you (by previous subsistence) and multiplying (not merely as A. V. "abounding") render you (not the present tense for the future, but expressing the habitual character and function of these virtues) not idle nor yet (introduces a slight climax: a man may be in some sense not unfruitful, but yet unworkful) unfruitful towards (not "in" as A. V.: these virtues are all regarded as so many steps in advancing towards the perfect knowledge of Christ, which is the great complex end of the Christian life) the perfect knowledge (here, considering the place which it holds, it is well to give the full sense of this word, which is the same as in vv. 2, 3; not as He only can declare Christ, who reflects Christ).

9.] For (negative reason: see above: and that, with reference not only to the exhortations of vv. 5, 6, 7, but by this for connected also with ver. 8: the advantage of the presence is great, for the disadvantage of the absence indicates no less than spiritual blindness and oblivion) he to whom these are not present (contrast to ver. 8) is blind (lacks discernment altogether of his own state as a member of Christ and inheritor of heaven), short-sighted (some interpret the word of not being able to see the heavenly things, which are distant, only earthly, which are close at hand. Perhaps, however, this is an interpretation more subtle than the Apostle's meaning), having incurred forgetfulness of the purification of his former sins (i.e. of the fact of his ancient, pre-Christian, sins having been purged away in his baptism. This, and not the purification of the sins of the world, and of his among them, by the cross of Christ, is evidently the sense, by the very terms of the sentence. in complying with the exhortation), brethren (making the appeal more close and affectionate), give diligence (so the A. V. admirably) to make (properly, to make for yourselves: not to make absolutely, which lay beyond their power, but to do it, on their side, for their part. But the verb must not be explained away into a pure subjectivity, "to make sure to yourselves:" it carries the reflective force, but only in so far as the act is and must be done for and as regards a man's own self, the absolute and final determination resting with Another) your calling and election (i. e., as Grotius, "The calling which came to you by the Gospel, and the election which followed it, when you became the people of God." In His foreknowledge and purpose, there is no insecurity, no uncertainty: but in our vision and apprehension of them as they exist in and for us, much, until they are made secure in the way here pointed out): for, doing these things (because these are works done. Wherefore (namely, because the doing these things is the only way to a rich participation in the blessings and glories of Christ's kingdom) I will be sure always to remind you concerning these things (the things just now spoken of: in the widest sense: it does not merely take up the "these things" of ver. 10, nor merely refer to the kingdom of Christ and His coming), though ye know them, and are confirmed (firmly established) in the truth which is present with you (the words "the present truth," A. And the sentence does not mean to say, as commonly understood, that he must soon put off his tabernacle, but that the putting off, whenever it did come, would be sudden and quick. Missing this point, some have imagined that some other special revelation to St. Peter is implied: and such revelations are related in tradition. But even if the adjective be understood to mean 'soon,' 'not far off,' no such inference need be drawn. For it might well be that advancing old age might lead the Apostle to the conclusion that the end prophesied to him could not be far off.

remarkable that, with the recollection of the scene on the mount of transfiguration floating in his mind, the Apostle should use so close together the words which were there also associated, viz. tabernacle and decease [exodus]: see Luke ix. 28 ff. The coincidence should not be forgotten in treating of the question of the genuineness of the Epistle) to exercise the memory of these things.

16.] For (reason for the zeal which he had just predicated of himself) not in pursuance of cunningly-devised fables (such cunningly-devised fables would be the mythologies of the heathen, the cabalistic stories of the Jews; and these may be alluded to, and perhaps also the fables of the Gnostics, which could, it is true, only be in their infancy, but still might be pointed at by St. Peter, as by St. Paul in 1 Tim. i. 4, iv. 7; 2 Tim. iv. 4; Tit. i. 14) did we make known unto you (the writer of this Epistle, says De Wette, wishes to appear to stand in closer relation to his readers, than the writer of 1 Peter: see 1 Pet. i. 12. But why so? May not the same Apostle in one place mean the actual preachers who delivered the Gospel to them; in the other, the Apostles, who were its first witnesses? For observe, that first Epistle is addressed to certain definite churches; this, to all Christians generally. Or, again, why should it be regarded as absolutely impossible that the publication of some one or more of the existing Gospels may have taken place, and may be alluded to in these words?) the power (viz. that conferred on Him by the Father at His glorification, of which the following scene testified, and the actuality of which He himself asserted, when He said, Matt. xxviii. 18, All power is given unto me in heaven and earth: in the strength of which He will come to judge the world) and coming (i. e., as ever, second and glorious coming: not, as Erasmus and many others, His first coming) of our Lord Jesus Christ, but [in virtue of] having been admitted (the participle, as so often, renders the reason,—the enabling cause of the act) eye-witnesses (the word used is a technical term, used of those who were admitted to the highest degree of initiation in the Eleusinian mysteries: and, considering the occasion to which allusion is made, there seems no reason for letting go altogether this reference here: “admitted as initiated spectators.” Still, in English, we have no other way of expressing this than as above. Any attempt to introduce the allusion would overcharge the language. The word “admitted” gives a faint hint of it) of His majesty (viz. on the occasion to be mentioned. The words must not be generalized, to reach to all occasions of such witnessing: but it is obvious that neither must the Transfiguration be regarded as standing altogether alone in such an assertion. It is indeed here that incident which marked, to the Apostle’s mind, most certainly the reality of Christ’s future glory: but it was not the only occasion when he had seen the exhibition of divine power by Him as a foretaste of his power at his return to judgment: compare John v. 25—28, with John xi. 40—44).

17.] For (justification of the above assertion that we were admitted witnesses of His majesty) having received (the construction is an interrupted one: so in the original) from God the Father honour and glory (honour, in the voice which spoke to him: glory, in the light which shone from Him), when a voice was borne to Him (the occurrence of a similar expression in 1 Pet. i. 13 is to be noticed) of such a kind (viz. as is stated in what follows: "purporting as follows") by (uttered by) the sublime glory (the words seem to be a way of designating God Himself. Others understand them of the bright cloud which overshadowed the company: others of the heaven: but the preposition by, in its only admissible meaning [see above], will not suit either interpretation), This is my beloved Son, in whom (literally, on whom) I am well pleased (the words are as in Matt. xvii. 5, where however we have "in whom" for "on whom," and "hear him" is added. In Mark and Luke the words "in whom I am well pleased" are wanting: and in the critical text of St. Luke it is, "my chosen Son." It is worth notice, that the words are in an independent form here. on whom is what is called a pregnant construction,—"on whom my pleasure has lighted and abides").

18.] Substantiation of the personal testimony above adduced by reference to the fact. And this voice we (Apostles: Peter, James, and John) heard borne from heaven (not, as A. V. ungrammatically, "this voice which came from heaven:" we heard it borne, witnessed its coming, from heaven), being with Him in the holy mount (De Wette is partly right, when he says that this epithet "holy" shews a later view of the fact than that given us in the evangelistic narrative. The epithet would naturally arise when the Gospel history was known, as marking a place where a manifestation of this divine presence and glory had taken place. The place whereon Moses stood is said, in Exodus iii. 5, to be holy ground. So that really all we can infer from it is, that the history was assumed to be already well known: which is one entirely consistent with the probable date of the Epistle: see Introd. It is hardly necessary to refute Grotius's idea, that Mount Sion is meant, and that the voice referred to is that related in John xii. 28).

19—21.] The same—i. e. the certainty of the coming of Christ, before spoken of,—is further confirmed by reference to Old Test. prophecy.

19.] And we have more sure (i. e. hold more surely) the prophetic word (a double explanation is possible: 1) that the comparative alludes to what has gone before as its reason, as if it had been said, Wherefore, or Now, or Henceforth we have, &c.: i. e. 'on account of this voice from heaven which we heard, we have firmer hold of, or esteem [possess] more sure, the prophetic word, as now having in our own ears begun its fulfilment.' The great objection to such a view is, the omission of any such connecting particles as those above supplied. It is true the Apostle may have omitted them: but even supposing that, it is further against the view, that if such be the force of the comparative, the thought is not at all followed up in the ensuing verses. We come then to the other possible force of the comparative: 2) that it is used as comparing the prophetic word with something which has been mentioned before, as being firmer, more secure than that other. And if so, what is that other? The most obvious answer is, the voice from heaven: and this is at first sight confirmed by the consideration that one word would thus be compared with another. But then comes in the great difficulty. How could the Apostle designate the written word of God, inspired into and transmitted through men, as something firmer, more secure, than the uttered voice of God Himself? And our reply must be, that only in one sense can this be so, viz. as being of wider and larger reference, embracing not only a single testimony to Christ as that divine voice did, but "the sufferings which were destined for Christ, and the glories that were to follow:" as presenting a broader basis for the Christian's trust, and not only one fact, however important. This is a modification of Huther's view, which takes the comparison to be, that the testimony of the Transfiguration presented only the glory of Christ in the days of His flesh, whereas the prophetic word substantiates His future glory also. But this is insufficient, or rather is not strictly correct: for the Apostle clearly does regard the voice at the Transfiguration as a pledge of Christ's future glory; to which ye do well in paying attention, as to a candle (the figure is taken from the lighting of a candle at night, and the imagery is as in Rom. xiii. 12) shining in a dark place, until day shall dawn (i. e. shall have dawned: the dawn coming in upon and putting an end to the state indicated above), and the morning star shall rise in your hearts (the dawn of the day is accompanied by the rising of the morning star.

It is not quite clear, what time is here pointed out by the "until &c." Various meanings have been assigned. Some think that Old Test. times preceded the rising of the day star of the New Test. dispensation. But it is entirely against this view, that the present, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, makes it necessary, as indeed does the whole context, that the time spoken of, which the "until &c." is to put an end to, should be present. De Wette modifies this last view by saying, that this Old Test. darkness of the pre-Christian time still endures for those who have not yet embraced the Christian faith. But this would make the readers, who are said, ver. 12, to be established in the truth which is present, to be still unconverted to Christianity. Bede, Calvin, &c., understand it of the glorious day which is to come when the Lord shall be manifested. Others, as Grotius, De Wette, Huther, &c., think that some state in the readers themselves is pointed at, which is to supervene upon their present less perfect state: Grotius interpreting it of their attainment of the gift of prophecy: De Wette, of their arriving at full conviction of the certainty of the coming of Christ: Huther, much the same, adding, "The writer distinguishes between two degrees of the Christian life: in the first, faith rests upon outward evidences, in the second, on inward revelations of the Spirit: in the first, each detail is believed separately as such: in the second, each is recognized as a necessary part of the whole. And hence the being in the former is naturally called a walking in a dark place, in the light of a candle, while the being in the latter is a walking in the light of the morning." And this latter I believe to be nearly the true account. That which refers the words to the time of the Lord's coming is objectionable, because thus 1) the time of the Christian's walk here, in which he is said to be light in the Lord, would, not comparatively, but absolutely, be described as a walking in darkness by the slender light of Old Test. prophecy: 2) the morning star arising in men's hearts is not a description which can apply to the Lord's coming. So that, whatever apparent analogy there may be with the comparison used in Rom. xiii. 11 ff., the matters treated of seem to be different. At the same time it may well be, that the Apostle should have mingled both ideas together as he wrote the words; seeing that even in our hearts the fulness of the spiritual day will not have arisen, until that time when we see face to face, and know even as God knew us):

20.] Caution as to interpretation of Old Testament prophecy: to be borne in mind, while taking heed to it. This first knowing (viz. what follows, introduced by "that:" first, as most important in applying yourselves to prophetic interpretation), that no prophecy of Scripture (Scripture most probably here imports the Old Test. only, from the whole cast of the passage) comes of private interpretation (how are these words to be understood? Two references seem to be possible: 1) to us, who try to understand written prophecies: 2) to the prophets themselves, as they spoke them. Of these the former, maintained by many Commentators, seems precluded by the context; the next verse assigning as a reason for the position in this, that the prophets spoke not of themselves, but as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. So that we seem driven to the conclusion that the saying regards, not our interpretation of prophecy, but its resolution, or interpretation by the prophets themselves. So several Commentators: and De Wette, adding, that this is said to excuse the difficulty of the interpretation of prophecy, and to remove occasion of unbelief and scoffing [ch. iii. 3]. But as Huther well remarks, this last purpose is not only not indicated in the context, but is quite out of the question; the Apostle referring to prophecy not as difficult of interpretation, but as a candle shining in a dark place, nay, as being even more firm and secure than external proofs of the same truths. I believe Huther's view to be the true one: which arises from this consideration, that by the word interpretation we are not to understand the subsequent interpretation of a prophecy already given, but the intelligent apprehension of the meaning of the prophecy, out of which [but not private on the part of those by whom it is sent] the prophecy itself springs. So that the sense will be, that prophecy springs not out of human interpretation, i. e. is not a prognostication made by a man knowing what he means when he utters it: but &c. Thus, and thus alone, the whole context coheres).

21.] Reason of the above position. For prophecy was never (at any time) sent after the will of man: but men spoke from God (spoke as with the voice of, as emissaries from, God), being borne (borne along, carried onward, as a ship by the wind) by the Holy Spirit.

CHAP. II. 1-22.] DESCRIPTION OF ERRONEOUS TEACHERS WHO SHOULD ARISE: THEIR UNGODLY PRACTICES, AND CERTAIN DESTRUCTION. On the close parallelism with Jude 1-19, see in Introduction. The fact will necessitate continual reference to that Epistle.

1.] Transition to the new subject. But (contrast to last ver<sup>c</sup>) there were false prophets also (as well as the true prophets, just spoken of) among the people (of Israel. These words, more than any that have preceded, define the prophecies spoken of before as Old Test. prophecies), as there shall be among you likewise false teachers (teachers of falsehood), the which (of a class: not simply identifying the individuals) shall introduce (shall bring in by the side of that teaching which ye have received. There is a hint of secrecy and unobservedness, but not so strong as in A. V. "shall privily bring in.") It is stronger in Jude 4) heresies (rather in the sense in which we now understand the word, new and self-chosen doctrines, alien from the truth: not sects, as the Latin vulgate has it, which may be founded, but can hardly be said to be introduced) of destruction (whose end is destruction, Phil. iii. 19. The expression is not to be resolved as A. V. [after Beza, as usual] by an adjective, "damnable heresies," as it thereby loses its meaning, merely conveying the writer's own judgment of condemnation), and denying (a remarkable word from St. Peter) the Master (compare Jude 4) who bought them (red<sup>d</sup>. No assertion of universal redemption can be plainer than this. Calvin passes it without a word. It may be noted that by the use of this particular description of Christ here, those heresies seem especially to be aimed at, which denied or explained away the virtue of the propitiatory sacrifice of our Lord, by which He has bought us to Himself), bringing upon themselves swift (not speedy, but sudden and unexpected) destruction (the same word as that used of the heresies above, and therefore to be rendered by the same word in English).

2.] And many shall follow after their licentiousnesses (the connexion of depraved moral conduct with erroneous doctrine was in the early ages of the church almost universal; see the Pastoral Epistles passim, and below vv. 18, 19. In Jude, the two are expressed co-ordinately: “turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Master and our Saviour Jesus Christ”), on whose account (by reason of whom, i. e. from the licentious ways of those who follow after the false teachers: for to these, and not to the false teachers themselves, is the “whom” most likely referable. 4–11.] Argument, enforced by three historical proofs, that God will assuredly punish these wicked persons. 4.]

First historical proof: the punishment of the apostate angels. Compare Jude 6. For (connect with the position immediately preceding) if God spared not angels having sinned (how, is not here specified; but Jude, ver. 6, is more particular: see note there. It is not as A. V. “that sinned:” but carries a reasoning force, giving the reason of God’s not sparing them: “for their sin”), but casting them into hell (literally, into Tartarus; the heathen name for hell, as Gehenna was the Jewish) delivered [them] over (here, as often, used with an implied idea of punishment) to dens (the other reading “chains,” has perhaps come from the parallel place in Jude, and would seem to suit the sense better: see there) of darkness in custody (literally “being kept.” The readings are in great confusion, from the combined influence of the parallel place in Jude, and our ver. 9) unto (with a view to: or merely temporal, until; but this is not probable here, as the want of any mention of the Great Day, as in Jude 6, removes all definite allusion to the time of the judgment) judgment;

5.] Second historical proof: the flood. (Wanting in Jude)—and spared not the ancient world, but preserved (here first comes in the idea of the preservation of the righteous, which is worked out further in the next verse) Noah the eighth person (i. e. with seven others: according

And burning to ashes the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah condemned [them] to (better than "with") overthrow (catastrophe: the same word that is used in the Greek Septuagint version of the history in Genesis), laying down an example (see Jude 7) of (i. e. that which might shew forth the fate of) those that should in after time live ungodly; 7.] and rescued (the contrast, the deliverance of the righteous, is here brought out at more length. not for rule nor for decency) in licentiousness (denoting the character of this behaviour or manner of life): 8.]

Explanation of the word distressed, or vexed. For by sight and hearing the righteous man, dwelling among them, tormented his righteous soul day by day with their lawless (not merely "unlawful," as A. V., but utterly broken loose from law, lawless) deeds (the form of the sentence is peculiar: that being represented as a deliberate act of Lot on himself, which was in fact the impression made on him by the lawlessness around him. The same way of speaking is common among us, when we say that a man "distresses himself" at any occurrence: we have in Isa. lviii. 5, "a day for a man to afflict his soul");

9.] (this is the latter part of the sentence, begun in ver. 4: see there) the Lord knoweth how (the expression indicates both the apprehension of the manner of the act, and the power to perform it) to rescue godly [men] out of temptation (as in 1 Pet. i. 6, where see note, — trials, persecutions, and the like), and to reserve unrighteous [men] under punishment (not as most, and A. 10.] but chiefly (see Jude 8) those who go after the flesh (more general here than in Jude, where "other," or "strange flesh," defines the particular sin. Here, all following after unlawful carnal lusts is meant) in lust of pollution (lust, hankering after unlawful and polluting use of the flesh), and despise lordship (so in Jude 8, where see note). Darers (the construction suddenly alters to a description of the wicked persons who were the object in the former sentence), selfwilled (see note on Titus i. 7, where the word is explained), they tremble not [when] speaking evil of (railing at) glories (so literally: but what is meant by this, is somewhat doubtful: see on Jude. We might take the word here, as there also, in its widest sense, as any dignities or glories, human or divine, were it not for the example there following).

11.] Whereas (i. e. "in cases where:" nearly the same as whereas) angels, being greater [than they] in strength and might (the participle "being" carries a slight reasoning force with it: "being," i. e. "though they be:" and the thought shews forcibly the unbecomingness of their irreverence, seeing that even angels, who are so far above them, yet do not bring railing accusations against glories), bring not against them (viz. glories, dignities: in the interpretation, bad angels, fallen from their heavenly estate, but regarded here according to their essential condition as sons of glory. Compare Milton's "excess of glory obscured," as descriptive of Satan,—an expression probably taken from the study of the original text in this place or in Jude) before the Lord ("before the Lord the Judge, actually present, they are afraid, and abstain from judgment," Bengel) a railing judgment (see Jude 9, in allusion to railing at above).

12–22.] Further description and denunciation of these persons. 12.] See Jude 10.

In words this verse is very similar to that, but in meaning quite different: and this fact, so often occurring in the passage, strongly confirms the view of the common matter taken in the Introduction, viz., that it is a portion of the utterance of the Spirit used independently by the two inspired writers. See the separate sense of each, in the notes on each. But (contrast to the angels, just mentioned) these, as irrational animals, born naturally for (with a view to) capture and destruction (i. e. not to take and to destroy, but to be taken and destroyed), speaking evil (as they do) in the matter of things which they know not, in their corruption (in their practising, and following out, of this corruption to which they have devoted themselves) shall even perish (shall go on till they perish; not only being found in it, living in it, advancing in it, but going on also to its final issue, viz. eternal perdition), 13 a.] receiving as they shall [the] reward of unrighteousness (exactly as in ver. 15, wages or retribution for unrighteousness: the only difference being that Balaam followed its temporal wages,

Some take them as meaning day by day, which seems unallowable. Some, as A. V., take them for “in the daytime,” as implying absence of all shame; but this would give a very lame and frigid sense, and is inconsistent with what is laid to the charge of these persons, which is not revelling or rioting, but delicate living, which those who practise carry on as much in the daytime as by night, being the habit of their lives. But, granting that interpretation as the words stand, there seems to be considerable doubt and difficulty about both reading and meaning, which can hardly be explained to the English reader. I may say that it arises from the confusion, here and in Jude, between agapais, love-feasts, and apatais, deceits. Here, the preponderance of MS. testimony is for the latter of these: in Jude, for the former. But it may be questioned whether agapais, love-feasts, was not the original reading here as well as there. And on this supposition, the meaning will be, that in their love-feasts [see on Jude] they find occasion of luxuriating and delicate living, while feasting with you) while they feast with you (this at all events refers to the love-feasts, whatever he read above. See on Jude), having eyes full of an adulteress (so literally: meaning that their prurient imagination has ever the forbidden image before it, as if they saw it with their eyes), and that cannot be made to cease from sin (see 1 Pet. iv. 1), laying baits for unstable souls (unfixed, not formed nor established in faith and the feature of piety), having a heart practised in covetousness, children of curse (i. e. as in 2 Thess. ii. 8; John xvii. 12, persons devoted to the curse, accursed. But the A. V., “cursed children,” does not give the meaning, “children” being used in the original simply with reference to their origin, the curse), <sup>15.]</sup> The last clauses, comprising our ver. 14, have no representatives in Jude. acter of Balaam, in his well-known volume), but had a rebuke for his own iniquity (what sort of a reproof is shewn below. If any force can be given to the insertion of own, it will be found in the fact that the reproof came from an animal which was part of his own substance: he himself furnished the conviction of his own iniquity, from the animal on which he rode): a dumb beast of burden (this expression is apparently used as synonymous with an ass in Matt. xxi. 5. If so, the universal practice of riding on the ass in Palestine must be regarded as the reason) speaking in man's voice hindered (not in matter of fact, for Balaam went on his way: but subjectively, was hindering, i.e. tried to hinder: "withstood," or as A. V. "forbad") the madness of the prophet (a discrepancy has been discovered between this and the Mosaic account, seeing that it was the angel, and not the ass, from whom the rebuke came, the ass having merely deprecated ill-treatment at Balaam's hands. But the Apostle evidently regards not so much the words of rebuke uttered, as the miraculous fact, as being the hindrance. It was enough to have prevented his going onward, when the dumb animal on which he rode was gifted with speech to shew him his madness). <sup>17, 18.</sup> Further designation of these false teachers, and justification of it. Compare Jude 12, 13, which is here much abridged. These are wells without water (in Jude, clouds without water. The comparison, in both Epistles, is simply to that which may be expected to yield water, and yields none), and mists driven along by a whirlwind, for whom the blackness of darkness is reserved (see on Jude. It is obvious that no just charge of inappropriateness can be brought against our passage because this clause occurs in a different connexion from that in Jude. There it is said of wandering stars, here of driven clouds: of each, with equal appropriateness: darkness being predicable of clouds, as well as of stars extinguished).

<sup>18.</sup> Justification of the description. For, speaking great swelling things of vanity (whose characteristic is vanity; as in the genitive "body of sin," Rom. vi. 6, and the like) they allure (above, ver. 14) in lusts ("in," or "with," describes the state of the tempters, and the element in which their laying of enticing baits is situated) by licentiousnesses (these are the instrument, the bait itself) of the flesh those who are scarcely (with very little space, or, very little time, for such escape) escaping from them who live in error (i. e., those unhappy persons who are but just escaping from the influence of those who live in error [the heathen], are then laid hold of by these deceivers, enticing them with licentiousness), promising them liberty (these are the great swelling things which they speak; holding out a state of Christian liberty, which proves to be the bondage of corruption) while they themselves are (all the while) slaves of corruption (the same words occur together in Rom. viii. 21, which it is very likely St. Peter had in view: compare ch. iii. 15. They promise that liberty of the sons of God, being themselves in the bondage of corruption). corruption here means, moral decay of sin, ending in perdition): for by what [ever] a man is overcome, by the same he is also enslaved (compare John viii. 34: Rom. vi. 6. These passages were certainly in the Apostle's mind).

20—22.] Further description of these deceivers, as apostates from Christ, and designation of their terrible state as such. For if, having escaped (it might seem at first sight as if the escapers of ver. 18 were meant: but on close inspection it is plain that this is not so, but that we are continuing the description of the slaves of corruption, viz. the deceivers themselves) the pollutions of the world, in (element and condition of their escape) knowledge (genuine and accurate knowledge: shewing that he is treating of men who have not been mere professors of spiritual grace, but real possessors of it) of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (expressed at length, to set forth more solemnly that from which they fall), but having again become entangled in these, they are overcome, their last state is (literally, has become: but we cannot say this in English, for we thereby convey an idea that it was not always so, but has undergone a change) worse than the first (the saying is our Lord's own: see Matt. xii. 45 and the parallel in Luke).

21.] Reason of these last words. For it were better for them not to have known the way of righteousness (viz. the Christian life: the way of truth, as in ver. 2) than, having known it, to turn back from (out of, as out of a way) the holy commandment (the moral law of the gospel: here so designated, because it is of moral corruption that the Apostle is treating) delivered to them (compare Jude 3, "the faith once [for all] delivered to the saints").

22.] Further description of their state by two proverbial expressions. There hath happened to them that of the true proverb, The dog gone back (i. e. "which has gone back") to his own vomit (in ref. Prov. we have something very like this. It may seem however somewhat doubtful, whether the proverbs, as here cited, be meant to be taken from Scripture, or rather not both of them from the popular parlance): and, The sow after washing to (gone back, or returned is generally understood before to. But it seems better, with Huther, to understand the proverb as self-contained, and elliptical, as in "Sweets to the sweet:" so, "The washed sow to the mire") wallowing in the mire.

tle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance: <sup>2</sup>that ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour: <sup>3</sup>knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, <sup>4</sup>and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation. <sup>5</sup>For this they willingly

CERTAINTY OF CHRIST'S COMING ESTABLISHED AGAINST CERTAIN SCOFFERS WHO SHALL CALL IT INTO DOUBT. EXHORTATIONS are intermingled, and follow as a CONCLUSION.

1.] This Epistle now, beloved, a second (so literally) write I unto you: in which Epistles (the A. V. well, "in both which:" viz. this and the first) I stir up your pure mind (the original word signifies that aspect of the spiritual being of man, in which it is turned towards the outer world; his mind for business and outer interests, guiding him in action. And this may be said to be pure, when, the will and affection being turned to God, it is not obscured by fleshly and selfish regards: the opposite being "darkened in their mind," Eph. iv. 18. It seems impossible to reproduce in English these distinctions; we can only give them a general rendering, and leave all besides for explanatory notes) in reminding (see the same expression, ch. i. 13); that ye should remember the words spoken before by the holy prophets (i. e. the Old Test. prophets, as referred to above, ch. i. 19 ff.), and the commandment of the Lord and Saviour given by your apostles ("your Apostles" as we call St. Paul the Apostle of the Gentiles. It is quite impossible that the common reading can stand,—having absolutely no authority; and difficult, even if it did, to render as the A. V. "of us the Apostles"):—knowing this first (Jude introduces the same prophetic fact with "how that they told you," ver. 18), that there shall come in the last of the days (see note on Heb. i. 1. It slightly differs from "at the end of the days," as extending by the plural, the expression, though perhaps not the meaning, over a wider space: see Jude 18) scoffers in [their] scoffing (scoffers making use of scoffing: see Rev. xiv. 2, "harpers harping with their harps:" 2 Sam. xx. 22, "the wise woman in her wisdom went unto all the people."

On the sense, see Jude 18), walking according to their own lusts (so Jude 11 and 16, here combined), and saying, Where is the promise of his coming (implying that it is nowhere, has passed away and disappeared: His, viz. of Christ: whose name would be understood as of course)? for from the day when the fathers fell asleep, all things continue thus from the beginning of creation (we cannot after thus supply "as they were," as A. V.: thus simply referring to the present; as they are, as we now see them: and the words "from the beginning of the creation," belonging only to the verb continue. This being so, we still have two predicated clauses belonging to the verb: "since the fathers fell asleep," and "from the beginning of the creation." The way of explaining this must be, that the time of waiting for the promise necessarily dates from the death of the fathers, and the duration of things continuing as they are now extends back beyond the death of the fathers: so that the meaning will be, ever since the death of those to whom the promise was made, things have continued as we now see them [and as they have ever continued even before those fathers] from the beginning of creation. So that "all things continue from the beginning of creation," is a general proposition applicable to all time: "since the fathers fell asleep," the terminus, from which this general proposition is taken up and applied to the case in hand. And now we have cleared the way to enquiring, who are meant by the fathers. And the answer is plain: largely and generally, those to whom the promise was made: the same as are indicated Rom. ix. 5, "of whom are the fathers:" yet not exclusively these, but simultaneously with them any others who may be in the same category,—e. g. those who bear to the New Test. church the same relation as they to that of the Old Test. The assertion, as coming from the scoffers, must not be pressed to any particular date, but given that wide reference which would naturally be in the mind of one making such a general charge).

For (i. e. they speak thus, because) this (viz. this fact which follows) escapes them (passes unnoticed by them) of their own will (i. e. they shut their eyes to this fact), that the heavens were from old (from the beginning of all things) and the earth formed (holding together, composed, subsisting; so the same Greek word in Col. i. 17, "By him all things subsist") out of water and by means of water (out of water, because the waters that were under the firmament were gathered together into one place and the dry land appeared: and thus water was the material, out of which the earth was made: by means of water, because the waters above the firmament, being divided from the waters below the firmament, by furnishing moisture, and rain, and keeping moist the earth, are the means by which the earth subsists. This is the simplest rendering) by the word of God (not of its own will, nor by a fortuitous concurrence of atoms), by means of which [two] (viz. the waters under the firmament and the waters above the firmament: for in the flood [1] the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and [2] the windows of heaven were opened, Gen. vii. 11. See the other interpretations in my Greek Test.) the then world (i. e. the whole state of things then existing. The Apostle's argument is, as against the assertors of the world's endurance for ever, that it has once been destroyed, so that their assertion is thereby invalidated. The analogy is not exactly, but is sufficiently close: and the world, as an indefinite common term, takes in the heavens and earth, which were then instrumental in, and purified by, the destruction, if not altogether swept away by it. Nay, the analogy is closer than this: for just as Noah stepped out of the Ark on a new world, the face of the heavens clear, and the face of the earth renewed, so we look for a new heavens and earth [ver. 13], yet like these others constructed out of the materials of the old) being inundated with water, perished (see last note; not, was annihilated, but lost its then form and subsistence as a world or order of things [cosmos, the Greek for world, signifies both], and passed into a new state. Only thus does the verse come in logically as a contradiction to the saying of the scoffers, that all things remain thus from the beginning of creation): 7.] but the new heavens and earth (contrast to the then world: the postdiluvian visible world) by His (God's: if the other reading [see margin] be taken, it must not be pressed to signify any one saying, but must refer generally to the prophetic word,

8-10.] Second contradiction to the scoffers: we are not to judge God, in the case of delay, as we do men, seeing that His thoughts are not as our thoughts. But let this one thing not escape you, beloved (this one, as especially important: escape you, in allusion to ver. 5), that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day (the saying is the completion of that in Ps. xc., setting forth also in a wonderful way, that one day may be in God's sight as productive of events as a millennium: in other words, when both clauses are considered, placing Him far above all human limits of time). The Lord (i. e. God, the Father, as so often in this and in the first Epistle) is not tardy (the verb signifies, not merely to delay, but to be late, beyond an appointed time; slack, as A. V.) concerning his promise, as some (viz. the scoffers in question, who are pointed at) account (His conduct) tardiness: but He is long-suffering towards you (the readers of the Epistle; not as a separate class, but as representing all; as shewn below), not willing that any should perish, but (willing) that all should go forward to repentance.

10.] Assertion of the conclusion as against the scoffers—the certainty, suddenness, and effect of the day of the Lord. But (notwithstanding the delay) the day of the Lord (i. e. of God; see below, ver. 12) shall (or, will) come (this verb has the emphasis, as opposed to all the doubts of the scoffers. It is more than merely "shall come," though no one word will give the exact force in English: "shall be here," "shall be upon you") as a thief (1 Thess. v. 2: from which place probably the expression is taken, as reference is made below to the Epistles of St. Paul); in which the heavens shall pass away (Matt. v. 18, xxiv. 34, 35; and Rev. xxi. 1) with a rushing noise (the word imports the rush of a bird, or of an arrow, or of any thing rapidly moving. Some understand it of the actual noise of the flames which shall consume the heavens: others, of the crash with which they shall fall), and the heavenly bodies (the word signifies, according to Bede, the four elements, fire, air, earth, and water: but he is obliged to modify the meaning of the verb, inasmuch as fire cannot dissolve or consume fire: according to Bengel, the sun, moon, and stars, defending it by this word being often used in that sense by the fathers. And, considering that this clause, on account of the but, followed presently by also when we come to speak of the earth, necessarily belongs to the heavens,—considering also that the mention of the heavenly bodies as affected by the great Day is constant in Scripture, compare Matt. xxiv. 29; Isa. xiii. 9, 10, xxiv. 23, xxxiv. 4, &c., I should be inclined on the whole to accept this interpretation) being scorched up (the word signifies, to suffer from excessive heat: to be in a burning fever) shall be dissolved (not literally, melt: in ver. 12, the word is a different one), and the earth and the works in it (this may mean either the works of men, buildings and the like, —or, the works of the Creator: perhaps both of these combined, “the works of nature and art,” Bengel) shall be burned up.

thus: viz. in the manner just described. The original may mean, being in course of dissolution: but the other rendering is far more probable), what manner of men (not interrogative, but exclamatory) ought ye to be (when the event comes: the verb here rendered be seems to imply some fact supervening upon the previously existing state), in holy behaviours and pieties (so literally; the plurals marking the holy behaviour and piety in all its different forms and examples) looking for and hastening (the older Commentators mostly supplied “unto” after hastening. So the A. V.; but there seems no reason for this. The meaning is most probably transitive, to “hasten,” “urge on,” which I agree with De Wette in adopting, and in understanding as he does, “They hasten it by perfecting, in repentance and holiness, the work of the Gospel, and thus diminishing the need of the ‘long-suffering’ ver. 9,” to which the delay of that day is owing. Luther’s objection to this is not difficult to answer. It is true, that the delay or hastening of that day is not man’s matter, but God’s; but it is not uncommon in Scripture to attribute to us those divine acts, or abstinences from acting, which are really and in their depth, God’s own. Thus we read, that “He could not do many mighty works there because of their unbelief,” Matt. xiii. 58, compared with Mark vi. 5, 6: thus repeatedly of man’s striving with, hindering, quenching, God’s Holy Spirit) the advent (elsewhere commonly used of a person, and most usually of the presence or advent of the Lord Himself) of the day of God (the same as “the day of the Lord” above), by reason of which (viz. which day; or, but not so well, which coming, on account of, for the sake of, which) the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the heavenly bodies being scorched up are to be melted (in the original, present, importing destiny: see above on ver. 11. De Wette thinks the meaning is not to be literally pressed, as if the heavenly bodies were a solid mass which would actually liquefy: but why not? The same liquefaction has actually taken place in the crust of the earth whenever the central fires have acted on it. All our igneous rocks have been in a liquid state: why should not that day, in its purifying process, produce a similar effect on the earth again, and on her cognate planets, if they are to be included?

In this recapitulation, the Apostle mentions that part only of the destruction of that day which concerns the heavens: arguing from the greater to the less. The similarity to Isa. xxxiv. 4 can hardly escape notice, "All the host of heaven shall be dissolved." See also Micah i. 4).

13.] The positive result of that day as regards the church. But (contrast to the destructive effects of the day lately dwelt on: not "nevertheless," as A. V., which looks as if the two effects were in antagonism, and the earth were to be annihilated, of which idea there is no trace. The flood did not annihilate the earth, but changed it; and as the new earth was the consequence of the flood, so the final new heavens and earth shall be of the fire) according to His (God's) promise (viz., that written in Isa. xxxii. 16) we (no stress, as is almost unavoidable in the A. V. "Nevertheless we, according to his promise:" there is no personal pronoun expressed in the Greek, nor is the distinction drawn between us and any other class of persons) expect new heavens and a new earth, in which (heavens and earth, plural) righteousness dwelleth (as before: Isa., compare also Isa. lxxv. 25).

is in the Apostle's mind) to be found (at His coming. This word shews plainly enough that a personal coming of the Lord, as in ver. 4, is in the view of the Apostle throughout, as connected with the proceedings of the great Day. The form of expression reminds us forcibly of Matt. xxii. 11 ff.) spotless and blameless (compare 2 Cor. vi. 3, viii. 20; also the contrast, above, eh. ii. 13. From the connexion there with a feast, it seems very probable that in both passages the parable of the wedding garment was floating before the Apostle's mind) in His sight (so, and not, "by Him," or "of Him," as A. V., must we render) in peace (second predicate after the verb to be found: the spotlessness and blamelessness were with reference to God; this, in reference to your own state and lot: in peace among yourselves, in peace with yourselves, in peace for yourselves, with God. But perhaps an expression so familiar to the Eastern tongue as "in peace," may have an onward as well as a present meaning, as in "go in peace:" and be taken of that eternal peace, of which all earthly peace is but a feeble foretaste): and account the long-suffering of our Lord (our Lord, thus expressed, is hardly to be dis severed from Him who is expressly thus named below, ver. 18. And if so, then, throughout this weighty passage, the Lord Jesus is invested with the full attributes of Deity. It is He who waits and is long-suffering: He, in His union and co-equality with the Father, who ruleth all things after the counsel of His own will) salvation (contrast to those who count His delay to be slackness, ver. 9): even as also (besides myself) our beloved brother (this term is probably used in a closer sense than as merely signifying fellow-

Christian: our beloved fellow-Apostle) Paul according to the wisdom given to him (see 1 Cor. iii. 10. Also Gal. ii. 9; Eph. iii. 2, 7, 8; Col. i. 25) wrote to you (What? Where? to whom? By some the reply to the first has been found in the preceding clause, "that the long-suffering of our Lord is salvation:" which, in sense, is almost identical with Rom. ii. 4, "the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance." But surely the reference is too narrow to satisfy what follows here, speaking in them concerning these things, where the reference must be to the things, which we Christians look for, viz., to the coming of the day of the Lord. Thus then we should interpret the particular reference to be to some particular passage in which St. Paul had exhorted to readiness in expectation of that day, and the more general reference, ver. 16, of the frequent mention of that day in his other Epistles. In searching then 2) for some passage which may fulfil the above condition, it seems to me that we need not go beyond the earliest Epistle of St. Paul, viz. 1 Thessalonians. There, in ch. iv. 13—v. 11, we have a passage on this very point, and the more satisfactory, because St. Peter seems, in our ver. 10, to have had 1 Thess. v. 2 before his mind. And as to 3) the expression to you, there seems no need to press it as identifying any particular church, seeing that this our Epistle is addressed to all Christians alike: see ch. i. 1. All that follows from this to you is what may also be gathered from ver. 16, that our Epistle belongs to a date when the Pauline Epistles were no longer the property only of the churches to which they were written, but were dispersed through, and considered to belong to, the whole Christian Church. What date that is, I have discussed in the Introduction. There have been very various opinions as to the passage and Epistle meant: some think it to be the Epistle to the Hebrews, on account of ch. ix. 26 ff., x. 25, 37 (see on these in the Introd. to the Hebrews,

§ i. par. 6): others, the Epistles to the Corinthians, especially 1 Cor. i. 7—9, finding an allusion to 1 Cor. ii. 1 ff. in the words "according to the wisdom given to him:" others, the Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, Colossians, being addressed to Asia Minor churches, as they hold this to be: others, referring the words "in peace" to the difference between Paul and Peter, the Epistle to the Galatians: others, some Epistle which has not come down to us); as also in all (his, but not expressed: in all Epistles which he writes, leaving room for the possibility that the number of those Epistles was not complete, but still being added to) Epistles, speaking in them (as he does) of these things (viz. the coming of our Lord, and the end of the world), in which (Epistles, if the feminine relative be read: if the masculine [or neuter], "in which sayings of his:" not, "in which things," "in which subjects," as some have rendered by way of escape from the supposed difficulty: for the pronoun is correlative with the other scriptures, and must therefore designate some writings previously mentioned: or else the sentence is stultified) are some things difficult to understand (De Wette especially refers to 2 Thess. ii. 1 ff.: and it is not improbable that this may have been particularly in the Apostle's mind. See note on 2 Tim. ii. 18), which the ignorant (unintelligent, uninformed: this want of intelligence may arise from many causes: but the misunderstanding of difficult Scriptures is common to the unintelligent in general) and unstable (those who, wanting firm foundation and anchorage, waver and drift about with every wind of doctrine. Such persons are stirred from their Christian stability by every apparent difficulty: are rendered anxious and perplexed by hard texts: and showing more anxiety to interpret them somehow, than to wait upon God for their solution, rush upon erroneous and dangerous ways of interpretation) distort (the verb means, properly, to twist with a hand-screw or windlass. Whichever be understood, it is plain 1) that by these words St. Paul's Epistles are reckoned among the Christian Scriptures: 2) that there were at this time besides those Epistles, other writings holding a similar place, known as "scriptures;" probably, at least, the three Gospels [and Acts?], and some of the earlier written catholic Epistles. That by the other Scriptures should be meant the Old Test. "The only condition of perseverance is, continual increase," Calvin) in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (the genitive, of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, belongs to both grace and knowledge. The common rendering, "in grace and in the knowledge of . . ." would have been otherwise expressed in the original. Taken as above, the genitive stands in somewhat different relation to the two words grace and knowledge. As regards grace, it is a subjective genitive:—the grace of which Christ is the author and bestower; of which it is said, "grace came by Jesus Christ:" as regards knowledge, it is an objective genitive,—the knowledge of which Christ is the object).

Concluding doxology: "a hymn to Christ as to God," as Pliny says in his famous letter to Trajan. To Him [be, or is] the glory (the glory—i. e. all glory that is rendered: the sum total of glory) both now and to the day of eternity (so literally: the day which shall dawn at the end of time, and being eternal, itself know no end: "all eternity in one day," as E-tius says). Amen (compare Jude 25).

[CHAP. I. 1—4.] INTRODUCTION: THE PERSONAL AUTHORITY OF THE WRITER, AND OBJECTS OF THE EPISTLE.—This Epistle does not begin with an address, properly so called. But there is in this sentence the latent form of an address: the “unto you” of ver. 3, and the wish “that our joy may be full,” answering (see note) to the more usual greeting, seem to shew that what follows is an Epistle, not a treatise.

The construction of these verses is difficult, and has been variously given. The simplest view, and that generally adopted, is, that in ver. 1 a sentence is begun, which is broken off by the parenthetical ver. 2 inserted to explain ver. 1, and carried on again in ver. 3, some words being, for the sake of perspicuity, recited again from ver. 1. The smaller clauses, &c., are co-ordinate with each other. So that the sentence and construction flow smoothly and regularly.

That which was (not, ‘took place’) from the beginning (not synonymous with “in the beginning,” though in the depth of its meaning it is virtually the same. It sets before us the prior limit, but without meaning strictly to define it as such exclusively. The interpretation, “Since the beginning of the Gospel,” is connected with the misunderstanding of the whole passage by the Socinian interpreters, and cannot stand for a moment when we consider the context with ver. 2, and the use of this term by St. John when applied to Christ or to supernatural beings: see ch. ii. 13, 14, iii. 8; John viii. 44. Wherever he uses it of the preaching of the Gospel it is definitely marked as bearing that meaning: compare ch. ii. 7, 24, iii. 11. On the meaning of this clause see below), that which we have heard (the perfect tense extends the reference of the verb from the beginning, and that which the Apostle might have heard concerning Christ, e. g. from John the Baptist, down to the time when he was writing: regards his hearing as a finished and abiding possession), that which we have seen with our eyes (the same is true again. The seeing as well as the hearing is a finished and abiding possession. The clauses rise in climax: seeing is more than hearing: with our eyes emphasizes the fact of eye-witness), that which we looked upon (now, the tense is altered: because the Evangelist comes from speaking of the closed testimony which abode with him as a whole, to that of the senses actually exercised at the time when Christ was on earth. Notice the climax again: to look upon is more than to see: so Beza here: “which I saw with these eyes, and that not once, nor by the way, but which I

Surely no proof is wanted, that John, who lay on the bosom of our Lord, and was beloved by Him, had touched his Lord with his hands." Fritzsche. These words are not for a moment to be explained away: they are literal matter of fact, and form one of the strongest proofs that what is said, is said of no other than the personal incarnate Son of God) concerning the Word of life (the construction seems to be this: concerning depends strictly upon the verb heard, loosely upon the other clauses. The explanation turns wholly upon the sense which we assign to the words the Word of life: and here there has been great diversity among commentators. This diversity may be gathered under two heads: those who make the Word the personal Word, who is life, and those who make it the account, or preaching, or doctrine, concerning life. Of this latter number are, for the most part, Socinus and his school, and some few other expositors. The former includes Augustine, Bede, Calvin [gives both], Beza, Luther, Bengel, &c. And as these words are the keystone of the sentence, it will be well to set out the interpretation once for all. I regard then the Word of life as the designation of our Lord Himself. He is the Word, and is the Word of life, this genitive, of life, being one of apposition, as He describes Himself, as being the Life, John xi. 25, xiv. 6,—the Bread of life, vi. 35, 48: the Light of life, viii. 12: compare also i. 4. This being so, the things mentioned, that which,—that which,—that which,—are all matters concerning, belonging to, regarding, Himself, the Lord of Life: all together predicated of Him by the concerning, which more properly belongs to the one verb heard [notice that in ver. 5, where the nature of the message is stated, this alone, of all these verbs, is repeated]. That which was from the beginning is His eternal pre-existence and inherent Life and Glory with the Father: this is what, in a sense slightly, though but slightly, differing from the common one, may be said to have been from the beginning concerning the Word of life: that which was inherent indeed in Him, but by being announced to you, takes the form of being concerning Him; His well-known character and attribute. That which we have heard, and that which we have seen with our eyes, hold a middle place between the eternal and pre-existent and the material and human things concerning the Word of life; the hearing of the ear embracing all the teaching of the Lord respecting that which was from the beginning, and the seeing of the eye taking in both His glory, as on the Mount of Transfiguration, and the human Body which He assumed, with all its actions and sufferings: compare John xix. 35. Then, still lingering on the combined testimony to His pre-existent glory and His human presence in the flesh, he adds, that which we looked upon, which contemplation, as He Himself tells us, saw through the human into the divine, John i. 14, besides its earnest and diligent observation of His human life. Finally, he comes down to that which though the most direct and palpable proof for human testimony, is yet the lowest, as being only material and sensuous, that which our hands handled. All this concerning Him, who is the Word of life, is recapitulated again in ver. 3 under its two great heads, that which we have seen and heard, we declare unto you also. Lücke has very fairly stated, and refuted, the Socinian view which makes that which to be the teaching of Jesus from the beginning of His official life onwards, and the Word of life, as in ch. ii. 7, to mean, the word which ye heard: rightly stating the fatal and crucial obstacle to this view to consist in the words, our hands handled, which none of its advocates can in any way get over). And the Life (i. e. the Lord Himself who is the Life: compare John i. 4, "In Him was Life." This verse is parenthetical, taking up the last clause, and indeed the whole sense, of ver. 1, and showing how the testimony there predicated became possible) was manifested (from being invisible, became visible), and we have seen [it], and bear witness [of it], and declare (this verb does not,

The preposition implies not juxta-position only, but relation: hardly however, as some here, love: at the same time it sets forth plainly the distinction of Persons), and was manifested to us (here the parenthesis ends, and the construction of ver. 1 is resumed. But on account of the distance at which that verse now stands, the leading particulars of its sense are recapitulated): that which we have heard and seen we declare to you also (this also here seems to give to the Epistle the character of being addressed to some special circle of Christian readers, beyond those addressed at the conclusion of the Gospel, ch. xx. 31, or we may take it as indicating "you, who did not hear, nor see, nor handle with your hands the Word of life." But the other is more likely), in order that ye also (see above) may have fellowship with us (with us, the Apostles and eye-witnesses: being bound in faith and love to them, as they were to Christ): and indeed (the thought rises to the immeasurably more solemn and glorious character of the second fellowship as compared with the first: as if it were, "and this fellowship with us will not stop here: for we are but your admitters into another and a higher fellowship") our fellowship is with the Father and with (observe the repeated with, distinguishing the Personality, while the very fact of the fellowship with Both unites the Two in the Godhead. It is not, fellowship with God and us, but with us, whose fellowship is with God, the Father and the Son) His Son Jesus Christ (the personal and the Messianic Names are united, as in John i. 17, where He is first mentioned, as here. The question has been sometimes asked, why we have not here, "and with the Holy Ghost?" The answer to which is not, as Lücke, because the divine Personality of the Holy Ghost was not found in the apostolic mode of thought, but because, the blessed Spirit being God dwelling in man, though we may be said to have "the fellowship of the Holy Ghost," 2 Cor. xiii. 13,—we would hardly be said to have "fellowship with the Holy Ghost"). And these things (i. e. this whole Epistle: not, the foregoing, nor, the immediately following) we write, that our (our, i. e. of us and of you: not, of us, as distinguished from you) joy may be full (the joy spoken of is the whole complex of the Christian life here and hereafter: its whole sum is, JOY. As Düsterdieck beautifully says, "The peace of reconciliation, the blessed consciousness of sonship, the happy growth in holiness, the bright prospect of future completion and glory,—all these are but simple details of that which in all its length and breadth is embraced by one word, Eternal Life, the real possession of which is the immediate source of our joy. We have joy, Christ's joy, because we are blessed, because we have Life itself in Christ." It has been noticed before, that this verse fills the place of the greeting so common in the opening of Epistles, and gives an epistolary character to what follows).

5.] In each of these divisions, the first verse contains the ground-tone of the whole. And so here—GOD IS LIGHT.—And (serves to introduce the new subject) the message which we have heard from Him (viz. from Christ), and announce to you (Düsterdieck remarks, that St. John seems every where to observe the distinction between the two verbs, to announce and to declare), is this: that God is light (not, as Luther, "a light:" light is purely predicative, indicating the essence of God: just as when it is said in ch. iv. 8, "God is love." There it is true the predicative is purely ethical, and thus literal, when used of God who is a Spirit, whereas here, light being a material, not an ethical object, some amount of figurative meaning must be conceded. But of all material objects, light is that which most easily passes into an ethical predicative without even the process, in our thought, of interpretation. It unites in itself purity and clearness and beauty and glory, as no other material object does: it is the condition of all material life and growth and joy. And the application to God of such a predicative requires no transference. He is Light, and the Fountain of Light material and light ethical. In the one world, darkness is the absence of light: in the other, darkness, untruthfulness, deceit, falsehood, is the absence of God. They who are in communion with God, and walk with God, are of the light, and walk in the light), and there is not in Him any darkness at all (it is according to the manner of St. John, to strengthen an affirmation by the emphatic negation of its opposite; compare ver. 8: ch. ii. 4, 10, 27, &c. Of the ethical darkness here denied, the Scholiast says, "for neither is there ignorance, nor deceit, nor sin, nor death." The Greek expositors ask the question respecting this message, "And where did he hear this?"—and answer it, "From Christ Himself, who said, 'I am the Light of the world.'"

Their reply is right, but their reference to those words of our Lord is wrong. It was from Christ Himself: viz. from the whole revelation, in doings and sufferings and sayings, of Him who was the brightness of the glory of the Father. With that revelation those His words admirably and exactly coincided: but they were not the source of the message, referring as they did specially to Himself, and not directly to the Father. In His whole life on earth, and in the testimony of His Spirit, He declared Him. So that this message is the result of the whole complex of ver. 1).

6.] None can have fellowship with Him who walk in darkness. If we say (the hypothesis is not assumed,—"If we say, as we do:"—but is purely hypothetical, "say who will and when he will." The first person plural gives to the sayings a more general form, precluding any from escaping from the inference: at the same time that by including himself in the hypothesis, the Apostle descends to the level of his readers, thus giving to his exhortations the "come," and not "go," which ever wins men's hearts the most) that we have fellowship with Him (see on ver. 3. "Communion with God is the very innermost essence of all true Christian life." Huther), and walk in the darkness (walk, as so often in the New Test. of the whole being and moving and turning in the world: as Bengel, "by inward or outward action, whithersoever we turn ourselves; the light, the darkness, mark off the two more distinctly than could be done without the articles, as two existing separate ethical regions, the God and no-God regions of spiritual being), we lie (our assertion is a false one) and do not the truth (this clause is not a mere repetition, in a negative form, of the preceding "we lie:" but is an independent proposition, answering to "and walk in the darkness," and asserting that all such walking in darkness is a not-doing of the truth. Christ is "the Truth;" and all doing the Truth is of Him, and of those who are in union with Him. So that the

7.] (is not merely the contrasted hypothesis to ver. 6, but together with that contains a further unfolding of the subject): but if we walk in the light (this walking in the light is explained by what follows, as He is in the light, and by the end of the sentence, which gives the result of so walking,—viz. fellowship, &c. See Eph. v. 8 ff. for the ethical details) as He (God) is in the light (because the Christian is made partaker of the divine nature, 2 Pet. i. 4. is in the light is parallel with "is light" above, ver. 5. is, as of Him who is eternal and fixed; we walk, as of us who are of time, moving onward: so Bede, "The distinction of words is to be noted; he says that God is in the light, but that we ought to walk in the light. For the righteous walk in the light, when, giving themselves to the working of good deeds, they advance towards perfection:" see note on ch. ii. 6: the light is the element in which God dwelleth: compare 1 Tim. vi. 16. Notice that this walking in the light, as He is in the light, is no mere imitation of God, but is an identity in the essential element of our daily walk with the essential element of God's eternal being: not imitation, but coincidence and identity of the very atmosphere of life), we have fellowship with one another (these words are to be taken in their plain literal sense, and refer, not to our communion with God, which is assumed in our walking in the light as He is in the light, but to our mutual communion with one another by all having the same ground-element of life, viz. the light of the Lord, Isa. ii. 5. There is evidently an allusion to ver. 3, and as there fellowship with God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ is expressed, so here it lies in the background, but need not be supplied. De Wette's remark is most true; Christian communion is then only real, when it is communion with God), and the blood of Jesus His Son cleanseth us from all sin (in order to understand rightly this important sentence, we must fix definitely two or three points regarding its connexion and construction. First then, and connects it, as an additional result of our walking in the light, as He is in the light, with the words we have fellowship one with another: just as in ch. iii. 10, end, and he that loveth not his brother. Consequently, the proposition contained in it cannot be the ground of the former one, that "if we walk, &c., we have fellowship, &c.," but follows as a co-ordinate result with the fact, of our having fellowship. Secondly, cleanseth is the present tense, and must be kept to its present meaning. This consideration precludes all meanings which make it refer to the past effect of the Atonement on us, either absolutely, by its having happened, or as applied to us in Baptism. Thirdly, the sense of cleanseth must be accurately ascertained, and strictly kept to. In ver. 9, "to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" is plainly distinguished from "to forgive us our sins:" distinguished, as a further process: as, in a word, sanctification, distinct from justification. This meaning then, however much it may be supposed that justification is implied or presupposed, must be held fast here. Fourthly, the sense of the blood of Jesus must be also clearly defined. The expression is an objective one, not a subjective: is spoken of that which is the objective cause from without, of our being cleansed from all sin. And this is the material Blood of Jesus the personal Redeemer, shed on the cross as a propitiatory sacrifice for the sin of the world. So we have the same Blood said in Col. i. 20 to be the great medium of pacification between God and the world: so in Eph. i. 7, to be the means of our redemption: so in Heb. ix. 14, which approaches very nearly to our passage, to cleanse [here] our conscience from dead works to serve the living God. In all these places, and similar ones, whatever application to ourselves by faith or otherwise may lie in the background, it is not that which is spoken of, but the Blood of Christ itself, as the actual objective cause, once for all, of our reconciliation and sanctification.

say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. <sup>9</sup> If we confess our sins, he is

These considerations remove much of the difficulty and possible misunderstanding of the sentence. Thus understood, it will mean, that this our walking in light, itself necessarily grounded in communion with the Father and the Son, will bring about, that whatever sins we may still be betrayed into by the infirmity of our nature and the malice of the devil, from them the Blood of Jesus purifies us day by day. Observe, not, the application of that Blood: for we are speaking of a state of faith and holiness, in which that blood is continually applied: the walking in the light is, in fact, the application: is that which, as a subjective conditional element, makes that Blood of Christ's cross to be to us a means of purifying from all sin.—The whole doctrine of this verse is fully and admirably set forth in Dürstler. The sum of what he says may be thus stated. St. John, in accord with the other Apostles, sets forth the Death and Blood of Christ in two different aspects: 1) as the one sin-offering for the world, in which sense we are justified by the application of the blood of Christ by faith, His satisfaction being imputed to us. 2) as a victory over Sin itself, His blood being the purifying medium, whereby we gradually, being already justified, become pure and clean from all sin. And this application of Christ's blood is made by the Spirit which dwelleth in us. The former of these asserts the imputed righteousness of Christ put on us in justification: the latter, the inherent righteousness of Christ, wrought in us gradually in sanctification. And it is of this latter that he here is treating. Compare next verse).

8—11. 2.] Unfolding of the idea of purification from sin by the blood of Christ in connexion with our walking in light. This last is adduced in one of its plainest and simplest consequences, viz. the recognition of all that is yet darkness in us, in the confession of our sins. "If thou hast confessed thyself a sinner, the truth is in thee: for truth itself is light. Thy life is not yet all light, because there are yet sins in it: but nevertheless thou hast begun to be illuminated, because there is in thee confession of sins." The light that is in us convicts the darkness, and we, no longer loving or desiring to sin, have, by means of the propitiatory and sanctifying blood of Christ, both full forgiveness of and sure purification from all our sins. But the true test of this state of communion with and knowledge of God is, the keeping of His commandments [ii. 3—6], the walking as Christ walked: and this test is concentrated and summed up in its one crucial application, viz. to the law of love [ii. 7—11].

8.] If we say that we have not sin (i. e. in the course and abiding of our walking in light: if we maintain that we are pure and free from all stain of sin. St. John is writing to persons whose sins have been forgiven them [ii. 12], and therefore necessarily the present tense [we have] refers not to any previous state of sinful life before conversion, but to their now existing state and the sins to which they are liable in that state. And in thus referring, it takes up the conclusion of the last verse, in which the onward cleansing power of the sanctifying blood of Christ was asserted: as if it were said this state of needing cleansing from all present sin is veritably that of all of us: and our recognition and confession of it is the very first essential of walking in light), we are deceiving ourselves (causing ourselves to err from the straight and true way), and the truth (God's truth, objective) is not in us (has not subjective place in us. That truth respecting God's holiness and our own sinfulness, which is the very first spark of light within, has no place in us at all).

9.] If we confess our sins (it is evident, from the whole sense of the passage, which has regard to our walking in light and in the truth, that no mere outward lip-confession is here meant, nor on the other hand any mere being aware within ourselves of sin, but the union of the two, an external spoken confession springing from genuine inward contrition. As evident is it, that the confession here spoken of is not confined to confession to God, but embraces all our utterances on the subject, to one another as well as to Him; compare James v. 16: and see more below) He (God the Father; not, Christ, though this may at first sight seem probable from ver. 7 and ch. ii. 1. God is the chief subject through the whole passage: compare "God is light," ver. 5: "with Him," ver. 6; "He," and "His Son," in ver. 7. It is ever God's truth [1 Cor. i. 9, 10, 13; 2 Cor. i. 18; 1 Thess. v. 24] and righteousness [John xvii. 25; Rom. iii. 25; Rev. xvi. 5] that are concerned in, and vindicated by, our redemption) is faithful and just (His being faithful and just does not depend on our confessing our sins: He had both these attributes before, and will ever continue to have them: but by confessing our sins, we cast ourselves on, we approach and put to the proof for ourselves, and shall find operative in our case, in the forgiving and cleansing, &c., those His attributes of faithfulness and justice. On the former of these adjectives, faithful, almost all Commentators agree. It is, faithful to His plighted word and promise: see the citations above.—The latter, just, has not been so unanimously interpreted. The idea of God's justice seeming strange here, where the remission of and purification from sin is in question, some Commentators have endeavoured to give the word the sense of good, merciful: or, which amounts to the same, fair, favourably disposed. But Lücke has shown, that in none of the Old Test. passages which are cited to substantiate these meanings, have they really place; but in all, righteousness, justice, is the fundamental idea, and the context only makes it mean justice in this or in that direction. See note on Matt. i. 19. The meaning then being just, we have still to decide between several different views as to what particular phase of the divine justice is meant. Some understand that God's justice has been satisfied in Christ, and thus the application of that satisfaction to us if we confess our sins, is an act of divine justice: is due to us in Christ. But this is plainly too much to be extracted from our verse. In Rom. iii. 26, where this is asserted, the reason is given, and all is fully explained: whereas here the ellipsis makes be most harsh and unprecedented, and thus to fill it up would amount to an introduction into the context of an idea which is altogether foreign to it. The correct view seems to be, that just as well as faithful here is an attribute strictly to be kept to that which is predicated of it under the circumstances, without entering upon reasons external to the context. God is faithful, to His promise: is just, in His dealing: and both attributes operate in the forgiveness of sins to the penitent, now and hereafter; and in cleansing them from all unrighteousness. The laws of His spiritual kingdom require this: by those laws He acts in holy and infinite justice. His promises announced it, and to those promises He is faithful: but then those promises were themselves made only in accordance with His nature, who is holy, just, and true. In the background lie all the details of redemption; but they are not here in this verse: only the simple fact of God's justice is adduced) to forgive us our sins (not "so as to forgive, &c.," but "that He may forgive, &c.") His doing so is in accordance with, and therefore as with Him all facts are purposed, is in pursuance of, furthers the object of, His faithfulness and justice. "So that He is faithful and just, in order that He may, &c." With regard to the particular mentioned, the forgiveness of our sins here means the continued remission of the guilt of each committed sin, which is the special promise and just act of God under the Gospel covenant: see Heb. x. 14, 18), and cleanse us from all unrighteousness (the explanation of the sense, see above. Here unrighteousness is used, in reference to the word "righteous," above, as corresponding to sins" in ver. 7. The divine righteousness is revealed in God's law: every transgression then of that law is of its nature and essence an unrighteousness, as contrary to that righteousness. The two verbs, forgive and cleanse, imply in the original, that the purpose of the faithfulness and justice of God is to do each as one great complex act—to justify and to sanctify wholly and entirely. <sup>10.</sup>] Not a mere repetition, but a confirmation and intensification of ver. 8. This verse is related to ver. 9, as ver. 8 is to ver. 7). If we say that we have not sinned (if we deny, that is, the fact of our commission of sins in our Christian state. The perfect tense, so far from removing the time to that before conversion, brings it down to the present: had it been "that we sinned not," it might have had that signification. we have not sinned answers in time to "we have no sin:" the one representing the state as existing, the other the sum of sinful acts which have gone to make it up), we make him (God, see above) a liar (this is the climax, gradually reached through the words "we lie," ver. 6, and "we deceive ourselves," ver. 8. And it is justified by the uniform assertion of God both in the Old and New Testament that all men are sinners, which we thus falsify as far as in us lies), and His word is not in us (His word may be interpreted generally,— "that which He saith.") "God hath said, Thou hast sinned: to deny that, is a crime. God's word truly accuses us, and by our contradiction of it, is driven from our hearts." Bengel. is not in us, as in John v. 38, has no abiding place in, within, us: is something heard by the ear, and external to us, but not finding place among the thoughts and maxims of our heart and life. God declares that to be true which we assume to be untrue. It is evident, that to understand the Old Testament by His word, is to miss the connexion, seeing that it is of the sins of Christians that St. John is treating, to whom His word has become a far higher revelation of His will, viz. that given by Christ, and brought home to the heart by His indwelling Spirit. This final revelation of God includes the Old and New Testament, and all other manifestations of His will to us: and it is this as a whole which we reject and thrust from us, if we say at any time that we have not sinned, for its united testimony proclaims the contrary).

CHAP. II. 1.] The connexion is thus given by Augustine: "Lest perchance he might seem to have given impunity to sins, by saying, 'He is faithful and just to cleanse us from all unrighteousness,' and men should say to themselves, 'Let us sin: let us fearlessly do what we will, Christ cleanseth us:'—he takes from thee false security, and puts in useful fear. Thou art disposed to be falsely secure: be thou watchful and careful; for He is faithful and just, that He may remit us our sins, and that thou mayest always be displeased with thyself, and mayest be continually changed even unto perfection. What then follows? 'My little children, &c.' But then perhaps sin after all, from human imperfection, supervenes. What then? Shall this lead to desperation? Listen, 'If any man have sinned,' he says, &c." See more below. But there is more in the connexion than this. It is not corrective only of a possible mistake, but it is progressive—a further step taken in the direction of unfolding the great theme of this part of the Epistle, enounced in ch. i. 5. The first step for those walking in the light of God was, that they should confess their sins: the next and consequent one, that they should forsake them, and, agreeably to their new nature, keep His commandments. This verse introduces that further unfolding of our subject, which is continued, and especially pressed as regards the one great commandment of love, in our vv. 3—11.

1.] My little children (the diminutive expresses tender affection: perhaps also is used in reference to his age and long standing as a father in Christ. There is a beautiful legend in Eusebius, where St. John calls back to him a young man who had gone astray with the words, "Why fliest thou from me, my child, me, thine own father!"), these things write I unto you, that ye may sin not [at all] (implying the absence not only of the habit, but of any single acts of sin. these things I write, not, that which follows; nor, both the preceding and the following: but the preceding only, viz. the concluding verses 8—10 of the former chapter, not in their details merely, but in their whole connexion. The object of writing that passage was, to bring about in them the forsaking of sin. The very announcement there made, that if we confess our sins He in His faithfulness and righteousness will cleanse us from all sin, sufficiently substantiates what the Apostle here says, without bringing out too strongly the contemplation of a supposed misunderstanding on the part of the readers. To do this is to miss the deeper connexion in which these words stand to the great whole in its harmony, and to give instead only an apparent and superficial one. The reference of this exhortation to the unconverted among them, and rendering "that ye abide not in sin," maintained by Socinus and his followers, need only be mentioned to be refuted. The past tense "have sinned," may serve to shew its utter untenableness). And if any man have sinned (have committed an act of sin: still speaking of those spots of sin which owing to the infirmity of the flesh remain even in those who are walking in the light. By this there is not any doubt expressed that all do occasionally sin, but the hypothesis is made, as ever by this formula, purely and generally. The resumption of the first person immediately, makes it evident that the hypothesis is in fact realized in us all), we have an Advocate with (towards, as pleading in His presence) the Father, Jesus Christ (the principal word requiring elucidation here is Advocate (Paraclete). There are two classes of interpretations of it, which, as already remarked [on John xiv. 16], by no means exclude one another. Of these, that one which may be summed up under the meaning "COMFORTER," has already been treated, on John, in the place quoted. With the other we have now to deal. ADVOCATE is the commoner sense of the word, and that which it certainly bears here. There is no discrepancy between this passage, where the Son is our Paraclete, and John xiv. 16, where the Holy Spirit is called by the same name: rather is there the closest accordance, seeing that there our Lord says He will pray the Father and He will send us "another Paraclete:" He himself, the Son of God, being thus asserted to hold this office in the first place, and the Holy Spirit to be His Substitute in His absence) [being] righteous ("in that He is righteous," as a contrast to "if any man sin." In a strict rendering, this force should be kept, and pointed out in explanation: in an English version, it is hardly possible to render it otherwise than our translators have done, "the righteous," though it is not absolutely correct. "The righteousness of Christ stands on our side: for God's righteousness is, in Jesus Christ, ours." Luther): <sup>2.</sup> and He is a propitiation (the word implies that Christ has, as our sin-offering, reconciled God and us by nothing else but by His voluntary death as a sacrifice: has by this averted God's wrath from us. According to the constant usage of Scripture, God is in so far propitious in regard to the sins of men, as He suffers His mercy to prevail instead of His wrath. See Septuagint in 2 Chron. vi. 25, 27; Jer. xxxviii. [xxxi.] 34, xliii. [36], 3; Numb. xiv. 18 ff.) for (concerning, i. e. in behalf of) our sins: yet not for ours only, but also for the whole world (in the latter clause there is an ellipsis very common in ordinary speech in every language: "for the whole world" is equivalent to "for the sins of the whole world." "As broad as the sin extends, so broad the propitiation." Bengel. But this has been misunderstood or evaded by many interpreters. Cyril and Ecumenius explain our to refer to the Jews, of the whole world to the Gentiles. And many others, taking the former in its true sense, yet limit the latter, not being able to take in the true doctrine of universal redemption. So Bede, holding that our applied to those then living, of the whole world to those that were to come after. But this unworthy and evasive view is opposed by the whole mass of evangelical expositors.—The reason of the insertion of the particular here, is well given by Luther: "It is a patent fact that thou too art a part of the whole world: so that thine heart cannot deceive itself and think, The Lord died for Peter and Paul, but not for me").

our sins: next requires that we keep His commandments. And in this (so literally: this is the conditional element: in this is placed, on this depends, our knowledge. In ch. iii. 24 [see below], the in this is resumed by the words, "By His Spirit which He hath given us") we know (from time to time, from day to day) that we have the knowledge of him (have acquired and retain that knowledge: this knowledge is not, as some make it, the love of God, as neither of course is it mere theoretical knowledge: but is that inner and living acquaintance which springs out of unity of heart and affection), if (the token, that we have the knowledge of Him, is present, if, i. e. it being assumed that) we keep (as a habit, from time to time, these commandments being necessarily prescriptions regarding circumstances as they arise) His commandments (first as to the expression. St. John never uses the word "law" for the rule of Christian obedience: this word is reserved for the Mosaic law, John i. 17, 46, and, in all, fifteen times in the Gospel: but almost always commandments, — sometimes the word of God or of Christ, John viii. 52 f.; xiv. 23 f.; xvii. 6, our ver. 5. And as a verb he always uses "to keep," very seldom "to do;" and to keep preserves its peculiar meaning of watching, guarding as some precious thing, "observing to keep." Next, whose commandments? The older expositors for the most part refer "Him," "His," "in Him," verses 3—6, to Christ. Most modern Commentators understand these pronouns throughout of God, and the second "He" in ver. 6, of Christ. That this latter is the right understanding of the terms, is supposed to be shewn by the substitution (?) in ver. 5 of the words "of God" for "His," and its taking up again by "in Him" in ver. 6, followed by "even as He walked." But of this I am by no means thoroughly persuaded: see note, ver. 6).

4.] Assertion, parallel with ch. i. 8, of the futility of pretending to the knowledge of God where this test is not fulfilled. The man saying, I have the knowledge of Him (see above), and not keeping His commandments, is a liar (answers to we deceive ourselves, ch. i. 8), and in this man the truth is not (see above on ch. i. 8, where the words are the same: 5.] assertion of the other alternative, not put as before, but, as usual, carried further and differently expressed: an opposition with an accession, as Grotius calls it): — but whoso keepeth His word (synonymous with His commandments, considered as a whole: on the mode of expression, see above), of a truth in him is the love of God perfected (why should this transition be made from knowledge to love? Love presupposes knowledge, and is a further step in the same fellowship with God: not indeed that the former step is passed through and done with, but that true knowledge and love increase together, and the former is the measure of the latter, just as keeping God's commandments is the test and measure of true knowledge of Him. And thus in the final and perfect ideal, the two are coincident: the perfect observation of His commandments is the perfection of love to Him. It is manifest, from what has been said, that this love of God must be our love towards God, not His love towards us). In this (in the fact of our progress towards this ideal state of perfection of obedience and therefore of love:—thus assured that the germ of the state is in us and unfolding) we know that we are in Him (this completes the logical period which began in ver. 3, by reasserting that verse, carrying however that assertion yet deeper, by substituting "we are in Him"

7-11.] The commandment of Love. The context see below. Beloved, I write not to you a new commandment, but an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning: the old commandment is the word which ye heard (on the right understanding of this verse, very much depends. The great question is, To what commandment does he refer? Does he point forward to the commandment of brotherly love, in ver. 9, or back to that of walking as Christ walked, in ver. 6? One or other of these views has generally been taken decidedly and exclusively of the other. But this exclusive reference is apparently wrong, and a compromise may be found more agreeable to the ethical habits of thought of the Apostle, and to the context of the passage. This context requires, 1) that we maintain a logical connexion between ver. 6 and ver. 7, as indicated by the duty urged in the one, and the commandment alleged in the other; and 2) that we maintain the like logical connexion between ver. 8 and ver. 9, as indicated by the figure common to them both, of the darkness and the light. Now, of these, 1) is neglected by those who understand the commandment barely as the law of love: 2) is neglected by those who understand it barely of following Christ's example. The former make ver. 7 spring out of no contextual development: the latter treat similarly ver. 9. And the true view is to be found as thus indicated: the walk of Christ, which is our example, is essentially and completely summed up in one word, Love: and so the command, to walk as He walked, essentially and completely resolves itself into the law of brotherly love: for this last, taken in all its depth, includes not one special detail in a holy Christian life, but the whole of that life itself. Taking then this view, how are we to interpret in detail? What is new? what is old? what is from the beginning? For these clearly all hang together. If from the beginning is to signify 'from the beginning of Old Test. revelation,' or 'from the beginning of God's testimony in man's conscience,' we seem to be doing violence to the simple mode of address which is prevalent in our Apostle's style. The terms "ye had" and "ye heard," especially the latter, will hardly bear interpreting of the remote forefathers of the readers, as on this hypothesis they must, but require to be confined to the readers themselves. And if so, the meaning of from the beginning is fixed to be, from the beginning of the Christian lives, from the time when they heard the word. Then as to new, and old, the explanation will be simple enough. The command to love one another cannot be said to be new, for it forms a part of the word which ye heard, nay, is the very sum and centre of that word: but again, it may be said to be new, inasmuch as it ever assumes new freshness as the Christian life unfolds, as the old darkness is more and more cleared away and the true light shineth: in that light we see light; in the light of Him who maketh all things new. That the commandment as such refers to the law of love, thus indeed connected with Christ's example here, but still to the law of love and no other, is plain from the whole usage of the Apostle; compare especially 2 John 4—6, where the very same train of thought occurs as here, the walking in truth being equivalent to walking in light here, being followed up by "even as we received commandment from the Father," and that commandment being characterized, as here,—"not as though I wrote unto thee a new commandment, but that which we had from the beginning," and finally being stated to be "that we love one another." Indeed the whole process of that passage from this point is most instructive as to our present one: "And this is love, that we walk according to His commandments: this is the commandment even as ye heard from the beginning that ye may walk in it:" where the same complex of the whole Christian walk is included in the one idea of love, and love identified with walking according to His commandments. Again in ch. iii. 11, the same formula is used in speaking of the law of love—"This is the commandment which ye heard from the beginning, that we love one another:" compare also ch. iv. 21, v. 3, iii. 22—24; again ch. iii. 14, iv. 16, John xiii. 35; ch. v. 1, 2, John xv. 10. To recapitulate: on the interpretation here adopted, the commandment is the command to walk as Christ walked, passing, as the context advances, into the law of love. This commandment is no new one, but an old one, seeing that they had it from the beginning, from the beginning of their faith, and it was in fact the sum of the word which they heard. 8.] Again (this takes up and contravenes what has been as yet said: as if it had been "in another view of the subject . . .") a new commandment write I unto you ("new," in that it was first promulgated with Christianity and unknown before: not, in that he now renews, and impresses it anew on them. The meaning above given agrees well both with the context and with St. John's habit of thought, as well as with matter of fact, and our Lord's own words, John xiii. 34, xv. 12. "When I stand at the point of time indicated by the term 'from the beginning,' and look forwards on the Christian life of the readers, the commandment appears as one long known; the readers have known it from the beginning as an essential commandment, they have had it as long as they have been Christians: on the other hand, if I look backward on the life of the readers before that beginning, whether they were before that Jews or Gentiles, this same commandment of necessity appears as a new one, essentially Christian, first beginning for the readers with that beginning; for even for the Jewish Christians the command of brotherly love is a new one, seeing that it is ordained in imitation of Christ, John xiii. 34"), which (thing, viz. the fact that the commandment is a new one: see below) is true in Him and in you: because the darkness is passing away (not, as A. V., "past:" the verb is present), and the true light is now shining i. e. the commandment is a new one, and this is true both in [the case of] Him [Christ] and in [the case of] you: because [in you] the darkness is passing away, and [in Him] the true light is shining: therefore on both accounts the command is a new one: new as regards you, because you are newly come from darkness into light: new as regards Him, because He uttered it when He came into the world to lighten every man, and began that shining which even now continues.

9, 10.] We now come to the enunciation of the law of brotherly love, and in a form resembling that used in ch. i. 8, 10: and in ver. 4, 5. First is asserted the incompatibility of living in hatred and walking in the light: then the identity of walking in love and walking in the light: then lastly as a contrast to the last, the same fact with regard to hatred and the darkness, and the blinding effect on him who walks in it. The light is as before, the light of Christ, now partially shining, but one day to be fully revealed: the darkness is the darkness of this present world, now passing away). He that saith that he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in the darkness until now (Düsterdieck has very properly protested against the softening down of this hate into "loving too little, neglecting, not cultivating," &c. "Nothing," he says, "can be more shallow and weak as compared with the ethics of the whole Scripture. All the truth, depth, and power of Christian ethics rests on the contrast so distinctly insisted on by St. John. On the one side is God, on the other the world: here is life, there is death [ch. iii. 14]: here, love; there, hate, i. e. murder [ch. iii. 14 ff.]; there is no medium. In the space between, is nothing. Life may as yet be merely elementary and fragmentary. Love may be as yet weak and poor, but still, life in God and its necessary demonstration in love is present really and truly, and the word of our Lord is true, 'He that is not against me is with me,' Luke ix. 50: and on the other side, the life according to the flesh, the attachment to the world, and the necessary action of this selfishness by means of hatred, may be much hidden, may be craftily covered and with splendid outer surface; but in the secret depth of the man, where where spring the real fountains of his moral life, is not God but the world; the man is yet in death, and can consequently love nothing but himself and must hate his brother: and then that other word of the Lord is true, 'He that is not for me is against me,' Luke xi. 23. For a man can only be either for or against Christ, and consequently can only have either love or hate towards his brother." Bengel says well, on ver. 11, "An immediate opposition: where there is not love, there is hate: for the heart is not empty" It has been questioned, who is meant by his brother. It seems plain that the expression here is not the same as "his neighbour," seeing that St. John is writing to Christians, and treating of their fellowship with one another. On the other hand, if we are to restrict the meaning to Christian brotherhood, it is plain that we cannot understand strictly his brother in verses 9, 11, seeing that the man there spoken of is in reality not a Christian at all. So that either we must enlarge the sense of brother, or suppose some impropriety of language in the use of the term in these verses, so that it might mean, him who ought to be loved by him as a Christian brother, supposing himself to be really a Christian. This difficulty does not seem to have struck any of the Commentators: but it is one which certainly will not allow us to confine the term to its utmost strictness of meaning. even until now, i. e. up to this moment: notwithstanding any apparent change which may have taken place in him when he passed into the ranks of nominal Christians). 10.] He that loveth his brother abideth in the light (i. e. the continuance of the habit of brotherly love is a measure of and a guarantee for his continuance in that light whose great command is Love), and there is none occasion of stumbling in him (so A. V., excellently. For it is clear by the parallel in ver. 11, that this is what is meant, and not, as the original words will also bear, that he gives no occasion of stumbling to others. Compare John xi. 9, 10, which is in more than one respect the key-text here. For it also explains the apparently difficult term in him, occurring as it does there in ver. 10, "but if any one walk in the night, he stumbleth, because the light is not in him." The light, and the darkness, by which we walk safely, or stumble, are within ourselves; admitted into us by the eye, whose singleness fills the whole body with light).

11.] But (whereas) he that hateth his brother (see above) is in the darkness (has never come out of it : corresponds to "abideth in the light" above: denotes his state, whereas "walketh" indicates more his outward acts), and walketh in the darkness, and knoweth not where he goeth, because the darkness blinded (it is a matter of old standing: "blinded," and not "hath blinded," because it is no new effect of a state into which he has lately come, but the long past work of a state which is supposed to be gone by and is not) his eyes.

12—14.] Threefold address to the readers, accompanied by a threefold reason for writing to them; all repeated by way of parallelism, with some variations and enlargements. On the connexion and explanation of these verses, it may be observed, 1) that we have three classes of readers, denoted the first time by little children, fathers, young men, and the second time by children, fathers, young men. 2) that all three are addressed the first time in the present, "I write," the second time in the past, "I wrote," or "have written." 3) that while to the fathers and young men the same words are each time used [to the latter with an addition the second time], the little children and children are differently addressed. The first question arising is, what do these three classes import, and how are they to be distributed among the readers? It is obvious that the chief difficulty here is with little children and children, the words for which in the original are not only different in degree, but also radically. The former word is used by our Apostle once with "my," ch. ii. 1, and five times without "my:" ch. ii. 28, iii. 18, iv. 4, v. 21; but always as importing the whole of his readers: and once it is reported by him as used by our Lord, also in a general address to all His disciples, John xiii. 33. Children is used by him similarly in our ver. 18, and reported by him as used by our Lord in a general address, John xxi. 5. These facts make it very probable that both the words are here used as general designations of all the readers, and not as a designation of any particular class among them. And this is made more probable, by the fact that if little children and children did point out the children among them, properly or spiritually so called, the rank of classes would be different from that which would occur to any writer, viz. neither according to ascending age nor to descending, but children, fathers, young men. We seem then to have made it highly probable that little children and children address all the readers alike. Now if we lay any stress on the third circumstance above mentioned, that little children and children are differently addressed, and not so fathers and young men, and endeavour therefrom to deduce any distinction between little children and children in the age or qualities expressed by them, I conceive that we shall establish nothing satisfactory. If a reason for this variation of address is to be discovered, it must be sought in the parallelism of the passage. With these preliminary remarks, we come to the details. I write unto you, little children (see above), because your sins have been (perfect) forgiven you for the sake of His (Christ's) name (Jesus Christ, the Saviour, the anointed One, bringing to mind all the work wrought out by Him for us, and all the acceptance of that work by the Father: so that it may be well said that on account of, for the sake of, that Name which the Father hath given Him, which is above every name, our sins are forgiven).

from the beginning i.e. in St. John's usage of speech, Christ; see ch. i. 1 and notes). I write unto you, young men, because ye have conquered the wicked one (the proper attribute of youth is, to carry on the active parts of life,—if soldiers, to be engaged in all active service: that of age, to contemplate, and arrive at sound and matured knowledge. The latter have conquered as well, but the burden and heat of their struggle is past. The wicked one is he in whom, in whose power, the whole world lieth, ch. v. 19; John xii. 31, xiv. 30, xvi. 11: the devil, who deceives from the beginning, John viii. 44; ch. iii. 8, 10, 12: whose works Christ came into the world to destroy, ch. iii. 8. He is conquered once and for all, by those who have passed from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, to communion with the Father and the Son, ch. v. 18. Whatever conflict remains for them afterwards, is with a baffled and conquered enemy: is a keeping them [from the wicked one], ch. v. 18, which keeping [see note there], owing to their whole life being led in communion with the Father and Son, is in fact a being kept, John xvii. 15.—He now repeats (see above) the three classes, but with some variations and additions in his reasons for writing to each, and with the past tense, I have written, instead of the present, I write. With respect to the possible reason for this change of tense, see note in my Greek Testament. Probably he refers, in both expressions, to the whole of this present Epistle). I wrote (or, have written) to you, children (by children, all the readers are meant: see above), because ye know the Father (the very word children reminds of father: and the relation is close between this and that which is said before, that their sins are forgiven for Christ's name's sake. They are received thus by adoption into God's family, and He is become their reconciled Father, as He is the Father of Him through whom they have received their adoption: and one of the first evidences of dawning intelligence in a child is the recognition of its father. But this knowledge of the Father does not precede, nay, it presupposes, communion with the Son: for none knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him, Matt. xi. 27).

<sup>14.] I wrote (or, have written) to you, fathers, because ye know Him that was from the beginning</sup> (verbatim as before: to shew perhaps in strong light the great truth of John xvii. 3, that the whole sum of Christian ripeness and experience is, this knowledge of "Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou didst send." Bengel gives another reason,—that no more is added, because the fathers, to whom the clause is addressed, needed not more to be said). I wrote to you, young men, because ye are strong (strong in fight: so in Heb. xi. 34; Luke xi. 21), and the word of God abideth in you (i.e. the whole announcement of the good news of the gospel in Christ has found entrance into your hearts and an abiding place there, and there dwells and works), and ye have conquered the wicked one (see above).

the Father, the abiding in Him by His word abiding in them, the victory over him in whom "the whole world lieth,"—these particulars have been enounced: and though there may be a more apparent reason why the young should have this dehortation addressed to them, and more apparent allusion to the words "ye have conquered the wicked one" in the bringing out of the "world," yet there can be no doubt that it is to all that this address is made. All are in the world, and as long as they are, are in danger of being betrayed by the senses to cleave to the things present and seen, to the forgetfulness of those which are absent and unseen. This general reference is shewn by the "If any man" which follows.

15.] Love not the world (what is the world, in the diction of St. John? And what does he import by loving the world? When we read John iii. 16, "God so loved the world," &c. are we to understand the same thing by the words as here? and if not, are both [viz. the world and love] taken in a different sense, or if one only, which? It would seem that the world in both cases is the same, the love is different. In John iii. 16 it is the love of divine compassion and creative and redeeming mercy: here, it is the love of selfish desire, cherishing avarice or pride. But then recurs our question, What is the world? And it is no easy one to answer. If 1) we reply so as to make it personal, we are met at once by the difficulty of "the things in the world:" from which we cannot escape by saying that these are as below, "the lust, &c." for none can be said to love the lust, but the lust is the love. Hence some have been led to take these three, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, the vain-glory of life, as put for the things desired, and the material of the vain glory. But this manifestly will not hold, owing to the opposition in ver. 17 between "the world and the lust thereof" on the one hand, and "he that doeth the will of God" on the other, which evidently requires that its first member should be personal as well as its second. And this last will be a weighty reason also against 2) taking the world as merely material, the present order of things, in so far as it is alien from God. We are thus brought to a point, for our understanding of the term, intermediate between personal and material.

But then our question is, which of the two is to take the first place? Is the world the world of matter, including the men who dwell in it, or is it the world of man, including matter as subordinate to man? If the former, we seem in danger of falling into a dualism, in which God and the world of matter should be set over against one another as independent existences: for thus the evil one, the ruler of the world, and his spiritual agents would themselves be included in the world, and adjuncts to the world of matter: a mode of thought which nowhere appears in the apostolic writings. We are thus narrowed to our other alternative, that of understanding the world as of human persons, including the inferior ranks of created being, and the mass of inanimate matter which they inhabit. Let us see whether this view will meet the necessities of our text and of similar passages. Thus understood, the world was constituted at first in Adam, well-pleasing to God and obedient to Him: it was man's world, and in man it is summed up: and in man it fell from God's light into the darkness of selfish pursuits and worldly lusts, in and by which man, who should be rising through his cosmic corporeal nature to God, has become materialized in spirit and dragged down so as to be worldly and sensual, and like him who has led him astray, and who now, having thus subjected man's nature by temptation, has become the ruler of the world. And thus the world is "man and man's world," in his and its fall from God. It was this world which God loved, in its enmity to Him, with the holy love of Redemption: it is this world which we are not to love, in its alienation from Him, with the selfish love of participation. And this world is spoken of sometimes as personal, sometimes as material, according to the context in which it occurs. To give but a few decisive examples: of the purely personal sense, John xv. 18, "If the world hateth you, &c.," followed by "If they persecuted Me, they will persecute you also," where the singular is broken up into the individual persons: of the purely material, John xi. 9, "If any one walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he becometh the light of this world." And in passages like the present, these two senses alternate with and interpenetrate one another: e. g.

man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. 16 For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh,<sup>b</sup> and the lust of the eyes, and <sup>b Eccles. v. 11.</sup> the vain-glory of life, is not of the

in the term "the things in the world," the world is apparently material and local: in the opposition which follows, between the love of the world and the love of the Father, the personal meaning begins to be evident: in what follows, "all that is in the world," which at first sight seems material, is explained by "the lust of the flesh, &c." which are the subjective desires of the "things in the world," not the things themselves: then, finally, in ver. 17, where "the world and the lust thereof," is opposed to "he that doeth the will of God," it is plain that we have passed, by the transition in the last verse, from the material to the personal sense altogether. This account may serve to explain that which has given so much trouble to Commentators here, the question whether lust is not put for the thing itself which is desired: the fact being that, the world including the material world in the men, the lusts, which are in the men, are in the world, as well as the things of which they are the desires, and which are in their turn included in them), nor yet (not merely meaning "nor," but carrying with it an exclusive and disjunctive force, implying that what follows is not identical with what went before. That was spoken of the world itself, the totality: "have no love for this present world as such." But an escape from this prohibition might be sought by men who would deny in the abstract the charge of worldly-mindedness, but devoted themselves to some one object of those followed by worldly men: so that it is necessary to add, after "Love not the world,"—"no, nor any thing in it") the things in the world (explained above: here, the objects after which the ungodly world's lust reaches out, and on which its vain-glory is founded). If any man (see on the same expression above, ver. 1) love the world, the love of the Father (i. e. love to the Father, as opposed to his love to the world) is not in him.

16.] Gives a reason for the assertion in ver. 15: viz. the entire separation from one another of the world and God. In order to understand clearly the following, it is necessary to define strictly the things

mentioned, and to lay down explicitly the apposition between "all that is in the world," and the three particulars which follow as included in that category. This can only be rightly done by bearing in mind what was said before,—that, as the world is summed up in man, both those objective material things which are properly the things in the world, and those inward subjectivities which are in man and grounded on his worldly state, are regarded as being in the world, and these pass into, and are almost interchanged with, one another. Now here, the three things spoken of as examples of the things in the world are all purely subjective,—"lust,"—"lust,"—"vain-glory." But they are subjectivities having their ground in the objectivities of the ungodly world: the first lust springs out of (see below) the flesh, the human nature unrenewed by God: the second resides in that sense which takes note of outward things and so is inflamed by them: and the "life," is that belonging to vain-glory, the manner of life of worldly men among one another, whereby pride as to display and pomp is cherished. Now each one of these three is included in, and includes in itself, love to the world: and he that loves the world falls into, walks after, becomes part of, these lusts, and this vain-glory, which is not of the Father but of the world. Loving the things of the world, he becomes conformed to the world, and following the lusts and pride which are in the world, he himself becomes one of the things in the world. Because every thing that is in the world (namely, or for instance), the lust of the flesh (of the flesh is not an objective gen., so that the words should mean, "lust after the flesh," i. e. impure desire: this they include, but far more. The genitive is subjective, the flesh being that wherein the lust dwells, as in Gal. v. 16, Eph. ii. 3, 2 Pet. ii. 18, Rom. i. 24: see also Rom. vi. 12; 1 Pet. iv. 2), and the lust of the eyes (subjective genitive, as before: the lust which the eye begets by seeing), and the vain-glory of life (the vain-glorious is one who lays claim to credit or glory which is not his

This life comprehends in it the means of living, and fashion of living,—table, furniture, equipage, income, rank; and the vain-glory arising out of these is that vain-glorious pride, which is so common in the rich and fashionable), is not of (springs not from, has not as its source: see below) the Father (this name is again used for God, in reference to little children and children above), but is of the world (has its origin from the world. It is necessary, in opposition to all such interpretations as that of Socinus, "i. e. is very discrepant from those things which God by Christ has ordered us to follow after," to lay down very distinctly St. John's limits of thought and speech in this matter. "Through our whole Epistle," says Düsterdieck [see especially ch. ii. 29, iii. 7 ff., iv. 2 ff., 7 ff., v. 1 ff.], "runs the view, which also is manifest in the Gospel of St. John, that only the mind which springs from God is directed to God. He who is born of God, loves God, knows God [ch. ii. 3 ff.], does God's will. God Himself, who first loved us, viz. in Christ His incarnate Son, begot in us that love which of moral necessity returns again to the Father, and of like necessity embraces our brethren also. This love is hated by the world, because it springs not from the world. It depends not on the world, any more than that perverted love which springs from the world and is directed towards the world, the lust of the flesh, &c., can be directed to the Father, or to God's children. So that St. John grasps in reality down to the very foundations of the moral life, when he reminds his readers of the essentially distinct origin of the love of the world, and the love of God. The inmost kernel of the matter is hereby laid bare, and with it a glimpse is given of the whole process of the love of the world and the love of God, even to the end; and this end is now set forth expressly with extraordinary power:" viz., in the next verse). <sup>17.</sup>

the lust of it (of it is subjective again; not objective, "the lust after it," but as in ver. 16: the lust thereof summing up in one the three which are there mentioned. is passing away, as in ver. 8: not declaring merely an attribute, that it is the quality of the world and its lust to pass away,—but a matter of fact, that it is even now in act so to pass. See on 1 Cor. vii. 31. It is no objection to this, that the abideth, which is opposed to this "is passing away," contains, not a matter of fact, but a qualitative predication. This is made necessary by the words "for ever" which that clause contains): but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever (in this latter member of the contrast, we have a clearly personal agent introduced: and therefore, as above remarked, we may expect that the former member also will have a like personal reference. But this expectation must not be pushed too far: seeing that in the world, the ungodly men, who are in all their desires and thoughts of the world, are included. They and their lusts belong to, are part of, depend on, a world which is passing away. On the other hand, eternal fixity and duration belongs only to that order of things, and to those men, who are in entire accordance with the will of God. And among these is he that doeth that will, which is [see vv. 3—6] the true proof and following out of love towards Him. As God Himself is eternal, so is all that is in communion with Him: and this are they who believe in Him and love Him, and do His will).

18—28.] WARNING AGAINST ANTI-CHRISTS AND FALSE TEACHERS (vv. 18—23): AND EXHORTATION TO ABIDE IN CHRIST (vv. 23—28). The place which this portion holds will be best seen by shortly recapitulating. "God is light, and in Him is no darkness;" that [ch. i. 5] is the ground-tone of this whole division of the Epistle. In ch. i. 5—ii. 11, the Apostle shews wherein the believer's walking in light consists. At ver. 12, his style takes at once a hortatory turn. In his addresses to the various classes of his readers, the tone of warning is slightly struck by "ye have overcome the wicked one;" if indeed the whole form of assertion of an ideal state in each case do not of itself carry a delicate shade of warning. Hence the transition is easy to actual warning. And this in vv. 15—17 begins by general dehortation from the love of the world as excluding the love of God, and now proceeds by caution against those in the world who would rob them of Him by whom alone walking in the light of God is made both possible and actual to us. The note of transition from the last verses is "it is the last time," here taking up the term "is passing away." The world is passing away: and those temptations and conflicts of which ye have heard as belonging to its last period, are now upon you: those adversaries who would endanger your abiding in Him and being found in Him at His coming. 18.] Children (as before, addressed not to any one class, but to all the readers), it is the last time (what is exactly the Apostle's meaning by these words? Clearly, in some sense or other, that it is the last period of the world. For we must at once repudiate such views as that of Bengel, who, strange to say, seems to understand it as "the last part of John's own lifetime," and that of Steinhofer, who explains it to be John's own time as the close of the apostolic age: and even more decidedly that of Ecumenius, that the last is to be interpreted the worst, as when we say, the last degree of misery, for all other reasons, and on account of the saying 2 Tim. iii. 1, "In the last days there shall come grievous times."

These then being cleared away, we come to the view of Grotius and others; that, when spoken of to Jews, the last time is that close upon the destruction of the Jewish polity; proceeding to interpret the antichrists to be the many false Christs who arose in that period, and Antichrist himself to be the chief of them, Barchochabas. But two sufficient replies may be given to this view. First, that thus these false Messiahs of the Jews must have gone forth from us, i. e. from the Christian Church, which they did not. Secondly, what would the approximation of the destruction of Jerusalem, viewed merely as a Jewish event [which it must be, on the hypothesis here, as the word last would only be true as addressed to Jews], have to do with the subject of our Epistle?

And thus we have arrived at the views of those who recognize here the last age of the world, but are anxious to get rid of the idea that the Apostle, in thus speaking, regarded the coming of the Lord as near at hand, and endeavour to give some meaning to the expression which shall preclude this [to them] objectionable notion. Among these may be mentioned Calvin, and many of the elder Commentators, who understand the latter dispensation: the time from Christ's advent in the flesh to His coming to judgment. But, apart, from considerations of the unfitness of such an idea in the context, in which the term "passing away," vv. 8, 17,—and our ver. 28, shew that it is the coming of the Lord which is before the mind of the Apostle,—this objection is fatal to it: that manifestly not this whole period itself, but some time within its limits is meant, from the nature of the sign given below, whence we know, &c. If the whole Christian dispensation were intended by the last time, it would not be stated as a sign of its presence, that already there were many antichrists, but rather that already He was come who is to be the final revelation of the Father. The circumstance of there being already many antichrists, corresponds with a prophecy delivered by our Lord, not of the general character of the whole of the last dispensation, but of the particular character of the time preceding the end, to which prophecy and to which time the Apostle here beyond question alludes.

I believe that if we are to deal ingenuously both with words and with facts, we must understand the Apostle to be speaking, as any one in any subsequent age of the Church might have spoken, and as we may speak now, of his time as being the last time, seeing that the signs of the last time were rife in it. How long it may please God to prolong this last time, how long to permit the signs to continue which demonstrate each age of the church to have this character, is a question to which it was not given to him, and is not given to us, to reply. To him indeed many prophetic visions were given, and have been recorded for us; but what is their plain and unmistakable import, will only then be known, when it becomes necessary for the churches to see clearly the signs of His coming): and even as ye heard (in our preaching when ye received the Gospel) that antichrist cometh (the present tense of ordained fixity: "is to come.") But who, and what, is Antichrist? As far as the meaning of the word is concerned, it may mean, either 1) one who stands against Christ, or 2) one who stands instead of Christ. The latter meaning is strenuously maintained here by Grotius, who holds that our Antichrist here has nothing to do with the adversary (antikeimenos) of St. Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 3: that being one who professes himself an enemy to God, whereas this is one who makes himself Christ: understanding this and what follows [see above] of the false Christs prophesied of by our Lord, Matt. xxiv. 5, 24. This he defends by analogy of words similarly compounded with anti-, which furnishes many examples of this sense of substitution for another. But, seeing that the other meaning, the adversary of Christ, is also upheld by abundant precedents of the same kind,—it is clear that we cannot solve the doubt by philology alone, but must take into account other considerations. And first among these comes the fact, that St. John, who was acquainted with the form pseudo-christ, using as he does pseudo-prophet, ch. iv. 1, never uses it, but always,—ch. iv. 3, 2 John 7,—this word Antichrist. Is it not hence probable that he intended to signify, not a false Christ, but an antichrist? Next, we may fairly allege the ancient interpretations, as shewing how Greeks themselves understood the word. In these we do not find a vestige of the meaning "a substitute for Christ" being attached to the term, but every where they interpret Antichrist by an enemy to Christ. Taking then Antichrist for Christ's adversary, I would refer to the disquisition and summary of opinions in the Introduction on 2 Thess. ii. 1 ff., where the reasons which have induced me to expect a personal Antichrist are given in full: as are also the indications furnished by prophecy, and by the history of the church and the world, as to his probable character and work), even now there have arisen many antichrists (what are we to understand the Apostle as saying? Is this fact alleged as a presumption that the Antichrist is near, these many antichrists prefiguring and heralding him,—or as a proof that he is come, being in fact the aggregate of these? The question is an important one, as affecting that of a personal or collective antichrist. And the first thing to be noticed in answering it is, that these many antichrists are explained by the Apostle himself, ver. 22, f., to be deniers of the Father and the Son: i. e. of the Son: and even more explicitly, ch. iv. 3, deniers that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. Here, however, this latter point is not yet brought out: here it is as liars that we hear of them: as deniers of the truth, which Truth is Jesus Christ, the Son of God: as not having the Spirit, which is truth and no lie, ver. 27. They are said to have gone forth from the Christian church, but not to have been of us, as their spirit is not of God, ch. iv. 3. They are antichrists; their spirit is the spirit of antichrist, ch. iv. 3, of which the readers had heard that it should come, and it was in the world already. From much of this it might at first sight appear as if these antichrists in their aggregate formed the Antichrist. But a nearer inspection will convince us that this cannot be so. [The] Christ and [the] Antichrist stand over against one another, and analogy requires that if the one be personal, the other should be also. And in ch. iv. 3 we are not told that merely the spirit is of Antichrist, but [in the original] that it is of the Antichrist, the personal reference being still kept. Again, we have "cometh," the present future of prophetic fixity, in both places, here and in ch. iv. 3, set against "there have arisen" and "it is:" and the verb itself, in its prophetic sense, one regularly used of Christ, as here of antichrist. So that our only refuge in order to consistent interpretation here, is to regard these many Antichrists, clothed with the attributes and having the spirit of the Antichrist, as being his forerunners in the sense of 2 Thess. ii. 7, "for the mystery of iniquity already worketh:" meaning, as I have explained at length in the summary referred to above, that the antichristian principle was then, as it is now, and will be in every age, working, realizing, and concentrating itself from time to time, in evil men and evil books and evil days, but awaiting its final development and consummation in [the] Antichrists, who shall personally appear before the coming of the Lord. In St. John's time, these many Antichrists were to be seen in the early heretical teachers whose false and corrupting doctrine and practice was beginning to trouble the church): from whence we know that it is the last time (these words are a formal statement of the connexion between the first and second members of the foregoing sentence, which without them it would be left for the reader to supply in his mind).

<sup>19.</sup>] These Antichrists are designated as having been formerly attached to the Christian church, but never really members of it. They had not that communion with the Father and the Son in which the communion of Christians with one another really consists, inasmuch as they deny the Father and the Son. They went out from among us, but they were not of us (did not really belong to us, as neither had they their origin among us); for if they had been of us they would have remained with us (the A. V. inserts "no doubt," as representing an erroneous rendering of the Vulgate Latin, which has here misled our translators. See in my Greek Test. The sense is, if they had really belonged to our number, had been true servants of Christ, they would have endured, and would not have become antichrists: their very becoming so proves the unreality of their Christian profession. This point is now brought out in what follows): but (the ellipsis [see marginal note] is variously supplied: by "they went out," as in text, from above: by "this was done," or "God doeth this." All these in fact come to the same, provided that we keep the simple sense of the purpose implied, which must necessitate a doer; and that doer, God. So that it will be better, as the divine purpose must be understood in the depth of the meaning, whatever be supplied, to take the simplest supplement, viz. "they went out," which is already the expressed verb of the sentence), in order that they may be made manifest, that all are not of us (the meaning is, that by their example it may be made manifest that all [who are among us] are not of us. The rendering of the A. V. "that they were not all of us," leaves open the inevitable conclusion that some of them are of us. The Apostle makes their manifestation the proof not that they were not of us, but that all are not of us, viz. all who are commonly found among us. It is not my intention to go into the question as to the dogmatic consequences which have been deduced from this verse. The Apostle is probably speaking here not dogmatically, but ethically. If there is a necessity in the inference, they would have remained, it is a "voluntary necessity." We must take these words, ver. 19, in intimate connexion with the enunciation of this whole portion of the Epistle, ch. i. 5—7. The object of this portion is, ch. i. 3, that ye may have fellowship with us, in that we have fellowship with the Father and the Son. This aim penetrates all the exhortation, ii. 19—28. This fellowship depends on the walking in light, i. e. on knowledge of the truth as regards ourselves and God, and love to God and the brethren. He who departs from the truth, he who loves not God and the brethren, belongs not to this fellowship, and shews that he belongs not to it. If he had belonged to it, he would have held fast his walk in the light, as shewn by these indications. This is the human side, on which our passage regards the act and fact. There is also a divine side. They who attain eternal life are given by the Father to the Son, and no man can come to the Son except the Father draw him [John vi. 37, 41, 65, xvii. 6], and such are kept by God [ib. xvii. 11]; but also we read that they believe on the Son, receive the word of the Son, and keep themselves [John vi.

40 xvii. 6 f., i. 12, James i. 27]. And so again on the other side, they who remain at last excluded from eternal life, are thus excluded not only by God's decree but by their own evil choice and will. The words cited above, John vi. 65, were spoken by our Lord with direct reference to the traitor Judas: but on the other hand St. John gives notices of the ethieal development of Judas, which leave no doubt that his depravity went hand in hand with God's judgment on him. Judas was covetous: his heart was inclined to mammon: hence he understood not the love of Mary when she anointed Jesus with her precious ointment: he grudged his Lord this token of love: he could not abide with Christ, because he shut his heart through greed, through love of the world, against the love of Christ: for the knowledge of the Lord, faith in Him, fellowship with Him, are all summed up in Love. Thus we see that in the rejection, as in the acceptance of eternal life, the two factors, God's will and man's will, are to be regarded in their ethieal connexion only. In order to that knowledge of God, which is eternal life, man must be taught of God [John vi. 45]: but man must also learn of God. And the more St. John sets forth the essential nature of this knowledge of God and Jesus Christ as ethieal, the more does he recognize, in putting forward God's will in the matter, man's will also. Christ is the Saviour of the whole world, ch. ii. 2, iv. 14. But in the personal appropriation of this universal salvation, not all really take it to themselves,—and many, who have taken it, fall away again, because they do not keep the grace given, do not abide in Christ, do not walk in the light. This last is by no means denied by St. John when he says, "If they had been of us, they would have remained with us." The words set forth an ideal similar to that in ch. ii. 5, iii. 9, v. 18. As in no one of those places can the Apostle possibly mean, that a true believer, one really born of God, has perfect love to God and cannot sin [for what then would ch. ii. 1 mean?],—so neither here can he mean that whoever once inwardly and truly belongs to the communion of believers cannot by any possibility fall from it).

20, 21.] The Apostle puts them in mind, in an apologetic form, of the truth which they as Christians possessed, and the very possession of which, not the contrary, was his reason for thus writing to them. This reminiscence carries at the same time with it the force of an exhortation, as so many of the ideal statements on Christian perfection in our Epistle. What they have in the ideal depth of their Christian life, that they ought to have in living and working reality. And (the copulative conjunction here denotes only the passage to a new particular, without distinctly marking its adversative relation to the last) ye (expressed in the original as emphatic: see above) have an anointing (the word signifies properly the oil or ointment with which the anointing takes place, not the act itself of anointing. For this we have in English no word adequate to the necessity of the passage: "unguent" is the nearest approach, but is still inadequate. On the meaning, see below) from the Holy One (viz. from Christ, the righteous One of our ver. 1, the pure One of ch. iii. 3, the holy One of Acts iii. 14, and holy One of God of John vi. 69: see also Rev. iii. 18), where the Laodicean church is counselled to buy of Christ, "eye-salve to anoint thine eyes that thou mayest see"), and know all things (or, according to another reading of some old MSS., "ye all know [this]"). But this seems not so appropriate to the context. The full and perfect knowledge of Christian truth is the ideal completion of those who have this anointing. This of course must not be understood as actually predicated of these readers: but the expression explains itself as referring to all things needful for right action in the matter under consideration: all things that belong to this matter. Some understand, all things necessary to Christian life and godliness. But now the question recurs, What is this anointing, and what leads the Apostle to use this peculiar expression here? The reply to the latter question is probably, as Bengel, "that it is introduced by the sound and derivation of the words Christ and antichrist which he has just been using." Christ is the anointed one, Christos: the anointing itself being chrisma. The Apostle sets his readers, as anointed of God, over against the antichrists, the enemies of the anointed of God. Then as to the nature of the anointing, we can hardly fail to be right in interpreting it of the Holy Ghost. For "Christ received the Holy Ghost without measure (John iii. 34): on Him the Holy Ghost abode (i. 33): God anointed Him with the Holy Ghost (Acts x. 38). Christ baptizeth with the Holy Ghost (John i. 33): He sends the Holy Ghost, who takes of His and shews it to believers (John xv. 26, xvi. 14, Acts ii. 33). And seeing that the Son hath all which the Father hath, the Father is said to send forth the Spirit of His Son into the hearts of His children (Gal. iv. 6: compare Eph. iii. 16, Phil. i. 19, 2 Cor. iii. 17 ff.), and this, at the prayer, in the name, through the mediation, of the Son (John xiv. 16, xvi. 7 f.): the Father anoints believers by giving them His Spirit (2 Cor. i. 21 f.), as He has anointed the Son with the Holy Ghost. And hence the Spirit, which we have received, is the token that we are in the Father (ch. iii. 24), and in the Son (ii. 27), that we are children of God (Rom. viii. 14 ff., Gal. iv. 6). The Holy Ghost teaches the faithful the truth and keeps them in it: that truth, in the knowledge of which they have eternal life, having thereby the Father and the Son." Düsterdieck. This anointing, by virtue of which they are Christ's and the Father's, and without which a man is none of Christ's (Rom. viii. 14, 9), in respect of which they are Christs, or anointed ones, the antichrists attack in its very root, and would rob them of, thereby severing them from the Son and from the Father: from light and truth and life. And this very anointing is the means and weapon whereby they must be detected and resisted).

21.] I did not write to you (it may refer either to what has immediately preceded, or to the whole Epistle: here probably to the immediately preceding) because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and because no lie is of the truth (i. e. coupling the fact of your knowledge of the truth with the fact that no lie is of the truth, I wrote to supply the link between these two, to point out to you the lie and the liar, that you might at once act on that your knowledge of the truth, and not listen to them that deceive you).

22.] Who is the liar (the question passes from the abstract, the lie, to the concrete, the liar, the utterer of the lie. Who is he that is guilty of the lie? The Apostle proceeds to identify this utterer of the lie of which he has just spoken. We have a similar question in ch. v. 4, 5: where after describing the victory that overcometh the world, he rejoins, Who is he that conquereth the world, &c., as here. Some have neglected the article altogether; so the A. V.; others have given it merely the force of pointing out a liar remarkable above others. But there can be little doubt that it refers, as above, to the preceding lie), but (literally, "if not") he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ (literally, "denieth [to the effect] that Jesus is not the Christ")? This (the liar just described) is the antichrist (on the personal interpretation, see above, ver. 18. the antichrist is obviously here used not as predicating the one person in whom the character shall be finally and centrally realized, but as setting forth identity of character with him, and participation in the same development of the antichristian principle. Something of the kind must be understood, whichever way antichrist be taken, collective or personal), who denieth the Father and the Son (it is implied then, that the denying Jesus to be the Christ, is equivalent to denying the Father and the Son. And this the Apostle carefully asserts in the next verse).

fesseth the Son hath the Father also. As nearly the whole of this Epistle, so especially such an assertion as this, formed a battle-field for the old rationalists. Some of the early Commentators and Fathers imagining that Jewish error was indicated by the denying that Jesus is the Christ, the idea has been again taken up by Semler, and others, and pressed in the anti-trinitarian interest. The Socinians and semi-Socinians all evade the Apostle's words by inadequate or far-fetched interpretations, understanding the expressions in this verse, of not obeying the teaching, not following the example, &c., of the Son, and by consequence of the Father. But the deeper and truer meaning of the Apostle's words has been recognized by all the better Commentators, with some variations from one another. While some mark perhaps too precisely the doctrinal character of the words, others make their force consist too much in an ideal and economical relation between the divine Persons. Still all are agreed, that that which is spoken of is the revelation of the Father by the Son only, and that he who rejects this in its fulness rejects all that can be known of the real essence and nature of the Father Himself. "The antichrists denied that Jesus, the definite Person whom the Apostles had seen, heard, and handled, is the Christ. In whatever sense this denial is to be taken,—the Apostle speaks merely of the fact, as known to the readers;—at all events, there is involved in it a denial of the Son of God; because it is only as the incarnate Son of God [ch. iv. 2], that Jesus is the Christ. And in the denial of the Son is involved necessarily the denial of the Father, since the Father cannot be known without the Son, and the Father cannot be perceived, believed on, loved, by any man, without the Son, or otherwise than through the Son, i. e. the Son manifested in the flesh, the Christ, which is, Jesus. So that in St. John's development of the argument there are three essentially connected points: denial of the Christ, of the Son, of the Father. The middle link of the chain, the denial of the Son of God, shews how the denial of the Father is of necessity involved in the denial of Christ. And the cogency of this proof is made yet more stringent by another equally unavoidable process of argument. The antichristian false doctrine consists mainly in a negation, in the denying of the fundamental Christian truth, that Jesus is the Christ. But in this is involved the denial of the essence of the Son as well as of the Father, and again in this denial is involved the losing, the virtual not-having of the Son and of the Father. In the sense of St. John, we may say, taking the first and last steps of his argument and leaving out the intervening ones: He who denieth that Jesus is the Christ, hath not the Father. And this necessary connexion between denying and not having, is perfectly clear, the moment we understand the ethical character, the living realism, of St. John's way of regarding the subject. As (ver. 23) we cannot separate the knowledge and confession of the Christ, the Son, the Father, from the having, the real possession of, the practical fellowship with, the actual remaining in, the Son and the Father, so conversely, together with the denial is necessarily given the not-having; together with the loss of the truth of the knowledge, the loss of the life which consists in that knowledge (John xvii. 3). In such a connexion, the confession of the truth is as essential on the one side, as the denial on the other. Each is the necessary manifestation of the belief or unbelief hidden in the heart. And this confession is not to be understood of the 'confession of heart, voice, and life,' as Bede calls it, but only, as ch. i. 9, of the confession of the mouth (Rom. x. 10, see John xii. 42). It is parallel with bringing a doctrine, 2 John 7, 10; and indicates the definite utterance of the doctrine which was made known by the apostolic preaching, ver. 24." Düsterdieck.

If it abide in you, ye too shall abide . . .) shall abide in the Son and in the Father (here again the rationalizing Commentators have endeavoured to explain away the close personal relation and immanence in God expressed by the Apostle’s words. But here as every where else, they entirely miss the sense. He in whom abides the message of life in Christ which he has heard, not only has received the tidings of that life, but is transformed into the likeness of Him whose seed he has taken into him: is become a new creation: and the element in which and by which he lives and acts is even He in whom and by whom this new life comes, even Christ the Son of God. And thus living in the Son, he lives in the Father also: for Christ the Son of God is the manifestation and effulgence of the Father, himself abiding ever in the Father, as His people abide in Him. If that union were abiding in them in all its fulness, they would have no need for his or any other teaching. On the different ways of taking the following words, which can hardly be set before the English reader, see my Greek Test.),—and is true, and is not a lie (what is true, and not a lie? the anointing itself, or that which it teaches about all things? Necessarily, I believe, from the construction, the former. And this is quite correspondent to the fact that the Spirit who is this anointing, is the Spirit of Truth [John xiv. 17], and therefore leads into all truth [ib. xvi. 13]. As Düsterdieck remarks, "The anointing which abides in and teaches believers is essentially true, is not a lie, and hence nothing can come from it which is a lie"),—and even as He (or, it? so A. V. and others: but the change to the past tense seems necessarily to refer to Christ as the subject,—the Holy One from whom the anointing came, and who is ever in the Writer's mind, a subject ever ready to be supplied) taught you, abide in Him (or, "in it?" or, in that which it teaches? Neither of these: for the "abide in Him" is immediately after repeated, and the reference of "Him" fixed, by what follows, to be to Christ).

28.] Conclusion of this part of the Epistle: forming also a transition to the next part: see below. And now (by this the preceding considerations are linked on to the exhortation regarding present practice which follows), little children (the affectionate repetition of this appellation binds this on to ver. 18, and to ver. 17), abide in Him ("a repetition of the precept with a tender appellation, to declare his paternal love toward them." Him, i. e. Christ: as before, ver. 27: but here even more decidedly): in order that if He should be manifested (in case of His second coming taking place), we (observe that he changes to the communicative way of speaking. This was not a matter in which Apostle and converts, teacher and hearer, were separate: but one in which all had a share: viz. the Christian hope of standing before the Lord with joy at His coming) may have confidence, and may not shrink with shame from Him (the preposition from, which is in the original, and is not to be evaded, as in A. V., expresses the flying from His presence, which the shame would suggest. "He who has not abode in the Lord, will flee from Him with shame and confusion when He appears." Düsterd) at His coming (Bengel remarks, "He seems to have written this Epistle before the Apocalypse, in which His coming is put off longer").

II. 29—V. 5.] THE SECOND GREAT DIVISION OF THE EPISTLE: the doing of righteousness, the sign of new birth from God: the opposite, the sign of not being of God. This main subject, enunciated in ver. 29, is carried onward throughout, and more especially with reference to brotherly love, which is the great and obvious example of likeness to God, and its absence the most decisive proof of alienation from Him. The various subdivisions see, as the exposition proceeds.

II. 29—III. 3.] Connected with the principle enounced ii. 29, is its obvious application to ourselves, as children of God. Hoping as we do to be entirely like Christ at His appearing, each one of us, in pursuance of this hope, is even now approximating to this perfect likeness by purifying himself even as He is pure.

29.] If ye know (appeal to their recognition of the divine character as that which he describes it) that He is righteous (of whom is this said? If of Christ, as seems most natural, after "in Him" and "from Him" preceding, we find a difficulty in the words "is born of Him" below, seeing that we are never said to be born anew of Christ, but always of God [through Christ], ch. iii. 1, 9; iv. 7; v. 1, 4, 18, &c. If on the other hand they are said of God, it seems strange that after a change of reference from the preceding "Him," another subject should be expressed in ch. iii. 1 by the words "the Father." In consequence of these difficulties, some have referred he is righteous to Christ, and of Him to God; which cannot well be. It would be possible, doubtless, to understand the whole of Christ, without change of subject from ver. 28; and to leave the words is born of Him as we find them. If it occurs nowhere else in reference to Christ, there is in it nothing abhorrent from our Christian ideas. And in St. John's sense of the intimate union between the Father and Son, he who is born of the Father might be said to be born of the Son also. But after all, the other view, which is that of most ancient expositors, must, I apprehend, be adopted. The analogy of the passage, as shewn in ch. iii. 1, 2, 9, 10, fixes the words is born of Him to birth from God: and the absence in the original of a new expressed subject in the words is righteous must be accounted for by remembering that this verse, as ch. i. 5, is the opening, and general statement, of a new section of the Epistle. And the essential unity of the Father and the Son comes in on this side also: so that the judgment alluded to ver. 28, which shall be executed by the Son, being judgment committed to Him by the Father, brings to mind the justice and righteousness in which that judgment is founded): ye know that also every one who doeth righteousness (literally, the righteousness, i. e. the righteousness which is implied in the word "righteous" above: if it were not too strong, we might almost say, "that righteousness:" the article shewing that there is no other. doeth, for all righteousness is energetic: it springs out of holiness, truth, love), is born (hath been begotten) of Him (God: see above: for the righteous begetteth righteous progeny). The inference here must be carefully kept to the Apostle's words and obvious sense. And those require that we should understand it thus: God is righteous. This is our axiom, from which we set out. And if so, then the source of righteousness. When therefore a man doeth righteousness, we know, we apprehend, we collect, from our previous knowledge of these truths, that the source of his righteousness is God: that in consequence he has acquired by new birth from God, that righteousness which he had not by nature. We argue from his doing righteousness to his having been begotten of God. And the right apprehension of this is the more important because the whole mass of Socinian and Pelagian Commentators have reversed the members of the argument, and made it conclude that doing righteousness is the condition, on our part, of becoming a child of God. And the Roman-Catholic expositors, while they avoid this error, yet go equally wrong, in understanding "hath been begotten" not as the statement of a past and abiding fact, but as the ground of a confidence as to the future).

CHAP. III. 1—10.] The true and distinguishing signs of the children of God and the children of the devil. 1—3.]

The foundation and source of all righteousness in us is, the essential righteousness of God. All our doing of righteousness is a mere sign that He has begotten us anew—that we are His children. And what great things are contained in this name—how precious treasures of faith, of hope, of love! On this thought the Apostle now enters. He places the whole glory of the children of God before his readers. The being righteous as He is righteous, is the token of that new birth, and the measure of the life which began with it: the striving to perfect and mature this token, to fill up this measure, is an additional proof that a man is of God. 1.] Behold (as in John i. 29; xix. 5, does not express the Writer's own astonishment, but directs the attention of those who are addressed. But there immediately follows upon us, the communicative address, so that in fact the Apostle does in a manner include himself among those addressed in behold), what manner of (including "how great," "how free," "how precious"—in fact, all the particulars which are afterwards brought out respecting this love: see ver. 16, ch. iv. 9, 16) love (is love here, joined as it is with the verb "hath bestowed," literally love itself, or does it import some gift, bestowal, or fruit of love? There seems no necessity for diverting the world from its proper meaning. As in ch. iv. 9, the proof of the love is that which is imported, not by the love itself, but by the verb joined with it; as by "was manifested" there, so by "hath bestowed" here) the Father (spoken here not, as some think, of God in general, the whole three Persons in the blessed Trinity, but personally, of the Father, as distinguished from the Son, in whom we have received our adoption) hath given (see above) unto us, that (how is that here to be taken? is it to be kept to its strong sense, indicating that our being called the children of God is the purpose of that gift of love just spoken of, or does it, as so often in St. John, introduce the purpose of that love, stated in the form of an end to be gained by its manifestation? Lücke and others keep the strong telic sense. "What great love," says Lücke, "hath the Father shewn us [viz. in sending His Son, ch. iv. 10], in order to make us children of God!" But the objection to this is, that thus a proof of the divine Love is hinted at in our verse which is not expanded, but is left to be gathered from elsewhere: and the purpose introduced by that becomes the secondary and remote subject of the sentence, whereas, from the idea of children of God taking up the preceding idea of birth from God, and being again taken up in ver. 2, it is evidently the primary subject. The other meaning is taken by the ancient Greek expositors; "what manner of love . . . resulting in, proved by, our being, &c." The effect of the love, that at which it is aimed in its immediate bestowal, is, that we should be called children of God: its ultimate purpose is another thing. See vv. 11, 23, where we have the same construction) we should be called children of God (why has the Apostle rather used should be called than "should be?" Probably to bring forward the title, the reality of which, notwithstanding its non-recognition by the world, he is about to assert immediately). And we ARE [so]: for this cause the world doth not know (apprehend, recognize) us; because it did not know Him (viz. Christ). — The insertion of the words, and we are so, appears to serve the purpose of bringing out the reality of the state conferred upon us with this title, in spite of any non-recognition of it by the unbelieving world. This clause is of the highest possible significance. On its assertion depends the therefore which follows: and we ARE God's children: for this very reason, because we bear not the name only but the essence, the world knows us not: and then, as a reason for this ignorance following on this reality of our derivation from Him,—because it knew Him not. The reality of a believer's sonship of God, and his non-recognition by the world, are thus necessarily connected together. But Whom did the world not know, and when? Him here, by the very requirements of the logic of the passage, must be the Father, who not being recognized, neither are His children; Augustine and others understand Christ. But this can only be, if we understand that the world rejected that revelation of the Father which was made by Christ His Son. And if we introduce this element, we disturb the strictness of the argument. It is the world's ignorance of God, considered as one great act of non-recognition, disobedience, rebellion, hate, which makes them incapable of recognizing, loving, sympathizing with, those who are veritably children of God: compare ch. v. 1).

2.] Beloved, now are we children of God (the world recognizes us not: but our sonship is real: none the less real, that we ourselves know not our future condition in all its manifestation. So that the next member of the sentence is introduced not with a "but," but with an "and:" the two are not contrasted, but simply put in juxtaposition as components of our present state. We are really sons of God, even now: and we look [this very word "now" suggesting a future] for an inheritance in virtue of that sonship: it has not been yet manifested of what sort that inheritance shall be: thus much we know, &c. Such seems to be the simple connexion, without any adversative particles expressed or understood), and it never yet was manifested (on any occasion: such is the force of the tense in the original. And the verb, as so often in St. John, and as in the next sentence, does not mean, made manifest to knowledge or anticipation,—for that it is, as asserted below: but, shewn forth in actuality, come to its manifestation) what we shall be (understand, in virtue of this our state of sons of God: to what new development or condition this already existing fact will lead. But we must take care not to fall into Grotius's error, "in what manner we are to be the sons of God:" for as Calovius rightly remarks, "there are no degrees of sonship:" we are as truly, and in the same sense, children of God now, as we shall be then: but now [Gal. iv. 1] we are children waiting for an unknown inheritance—then we shall be children in full possession of that inheritance. And hence, from the reality and identity of that sonship, comes what follows,—our certain knowledge, even in this absence of manifestation in detail, that our future condition will consist in likeness to Him). We know (no contrast, though "but" is required to fill out our English idiom: see above: what we know of this what we shall be, is this. There is not even a correction of the preceding: the connexion is simply, "This future condition of ours hath never yet appeared: thus much we know of it." we know, as always, of certain, well-assured cognition) that, if it were manifested (viz. the "what we shall be;" this verb takes up again the former one. So most of the ancients and moderns. On the other hand, Bede, Calvin, Beza [and the A. V.: Tyndale and Cranmer had "it"], and others, supply "He," understanding Christ: appealing to St. John's well-known usage which we have in ch. ii. 28, and below in our ver. 5. But it may be replied, that in the former case the subject was plainly suggested by the preceding words "in Him," in the latter actually expressed: whereas here the reference of the verb is no less plainly given by the preceding verb, here again repeated. Besides which, "He," in ver. 5, clearly shews that the divine subject of these verses is not Christ but the Father), we shall be (taken up again from above, and the emphatic like Him corresponding exactly to what above) like Him (God: see below), because (this connecting particle must be kept firm to its causal meaning, and all the difficulties of the sentence met thus, not by explaining it away. Nor does it express merely the mode of the transformation, as Lyra. Still less must we with Calvin and others reverse the causal connexion, and make the seeing Him as He is merely a proof that we shall be like Him. Whatever consequences it may entail, it is certain that the proposition introduced by because contains the real essential cause and ground of that which it follows) we shall see Him (God: see below) as He is (with St. John, the recognition and knowledge of God is ever no mere cognition, but the measure of the spiritual life: he who has it, possesses God, has the Father and the Son: becomes more and more like God, having His seed in him. So that the full and perfect accomplishment of this knowledge in the actual fruition of God Himself must of necessity bring with it entire likeness to God. And this is the part of the future lot of the sons of God which is certain. Because we shall see Him as He is,—which is taken for granted as a Christian axiom,—it of necessity follows that we shall be entirely like Him: ethically like Him: we shall behold, as (Eusebius says, "the just, the just One—the pure, the pure One." The difficulty, that no man can see God, is not in reality contained here, any more than it is in our Lord's "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." The word, however understood, has for its limit, that no created eye even in the glorified body can behold the Creator: that beyond its keenest search there will be glory and perfection baffling and dazzling it: but this incapacity does not prevent the vision, as far as it can reach, being clear and unclouded: being, to the utmost extent of which our glorified nature is capable, as He is—a true and not a false vision of God. And if it be again objected that we seem to be thus confounding the ethical sight of God which is the measure of our likeness to God, with corporeal sight of Him in the resurrection body, I answer that in the realm where our thoughts are now employed, I cannot appreciate that distinction between ethical and corporeal. We are speaking of things which eye hath not seen, nor mind conceived: what a spiritual body may imply, our ideas now do not enable us to conceive: but I suppose it must at all events be a body, all of whose senses are spiritually conditioned and attuned: that what physical capacities are to our bodies here, spiritual capacities will be there: and feeling this, however little I may know of the details of the great fact, it removes from me all insuperable difficulty as to the words "we shall see Him as He is." "I know that in my flesh I shall see God," may not be the right expression in Job, but it is the expression of my hopes as a son of God: it is the one expression of a hope in which all other hopes culminate and centre. And every son of God knows, that for it ever to be fulfilled, he must be growing onward in likeness to Him, pure, even up into His purity: for in His light only shall we see light.

One point only must be noticed before passing onward; the fact that several of the great interpreters understand Him both times of Christ. This has partly of course been occasioned by their supplying Christ as a subject to the verb "shall appear," or "shall be manifested," above. Augustine has one of his most beautiful passages, explaining how at Christ's appearing, the impious shall see only the form of a servant, but we the form of God. The whole view, however, does not satisfy the requirements of the passage. It is the children of God who are addressed: and the topic of exhortation is, that they be righteous as God their Father is righteous).

3.] And every one that hath this hope (viz., that of being like Him hereafter) on Him (i. e. rested and grounded on God. In God, and grounded on His promises, is all our hope), purifieth himself (these words are not to be taken in any Pelagian sense, as if a man could of himself purify himself: "apart from me," says our Lord, "ye can do nothing." John xv. 5. The man who purifies himself has this hope resting upon God. This mere fact implies a will to purify himself, not out of, nor independent of, this hope, but ever stirred up by, and accompanying it. So that the will is not his own, sprung out of his own nature, but the result of his Christian state, in which God also ministers to him the power to carry out that will in self-purification. See 2 Cor. vii. 1, which is remarkably parallel: and 1 Pet. i. 21, 22. The idea is much the same as that in ch. i. 9: it is entire purification, not merely from unchastity, but from all defilement of flesh and spirit), even as He is pure (Who is intended by He? Clearly below in ver. 5, Christ, from the facts of the case. But is it as clear here? Almost all the modern Commentators assume it, and the inference is upheld by a first view of ch. ii. 6, where much the same expression is used, and used of Christ. But there are some weighty considerations against the view. First, it is the Father, of whom it is written, "Be ye holy, for [or as] I am holy," 1 Pet. i. 15, 16, Levit. xi. 44, xix. 2: compare also Matt. v. 48. Secondly, it would be very harsh thus to introduce a new subject, in the face of this Scripture usage. Thirdly, it would be against the whole spirit of the context: in which sonship of God and likeness to God are joined together, and the hopes belonging to the state are made motives for the duty. Fourthly, if it be asserted that Christ is our Pattern, in whom we see the Father's purity shewn forth; I answer that this would be perfectly intelligible, if allusion was made, as in ch. ii. 6, to some historical manifestation in our Lord's life: but being as it is in the present tense, it refers to the essential divine attribute of purity: and if so, then to that attribute in its primary inherence in the Father. For these reasons and others which may be seen in my Greek Testament, I would interpret He here of the Father, in whom essentially abides this perfection of purity, and after continual increase of likeness to whom his sons, having the ultimate hope of being completely like Him, will be striving. In ver. 5, the case is otherwise: see there, and also on ver. 7).

4—10.] The irreconcilability of sin with the work of redemption, with communion with Christ, and with being born of God. The difficulty has been, to mark distinctly the connexion with the foregoing. In order to discover this, we must go back to the theme of the whole section of the Epistle, in ch. ii. 29: "If God is righteous, then every one that doeth righteousness, is born of Him." Hitherto the positive side of this position has been illustrated: the inseparability of birth-from-God and likeness-to-God. Now, the Apostle comes to treat its negative side: the incompatibility of sin with birth-from-God. And this he deals with essentially and in the ideal, as always. The whole is in the closest connexion with the foregoing, and is developed step by step with the minutest precision, as will be seen in the exegesis.

4.] In this verse we have verse 3 taken up from the opposite side. There, God's essential purity formed a law, according to which the child of God having hope of ultimate complete likeness to Him, purifies himself. Here we have it declared that the sinner goes counter to [this and all other] law: indeed the two terms, sin and lawlessness, are synonymous and convertible. Every one that committeth sin, also committeth transgression-of-law: and sin (abstract and in general) is transgression-of-law (abstract and in general). The assertion amounts to the identification of the terms, and the is amounts to "is equivalent to."

This being so, what is it exactly that our verse asserts respecting these two things, sin, and transgression-of-law? First and obviously, no appropriation must be made, in this verse and throughout this passage, of the word sin to one kind of sin, whether it be mortal sin as distinguished from venial [so the Roman-Catholic expositors], or notorious and unrepented sins, or sins against brotherly love [as Luther, and Augustine]. The assertions are all perfectly general, and regard, in the true root and ideal, every sin whatever. Every sin whatever then is a transgression of God's law: as indeed its very name in Greek implies: to sin being to miss a mark, and the mark being that will of God which is the law and aim to him who "doeth the will of God," ch. ii. 17).

compatibility of sin with the life of God's children: that He, Christ, in and by whom we have this adoption (John i. 12), and by being in whose likeness alone we can be perfectly like God, was manifested to take away all sins, being Himself sinless. And ye know (the Apostle assumes it as known by those who had an anointing from the Holy One and knew all things ch. ii. 20) that He (now clearly Christ, from the context, which [see above on ver. 3] can alone decide the reference in each case) was manifested (viz. by His appearing in the flesh, and all that He openly and visibly did and taught in it, or may be known, by the Spirit, to have done and taught) in order that He may [might] take away (in the original, "take away by one act and entirely." The meaning, "take away," and not "bear," is necessitated here by the context. Sin is altogether alien from Christ. He became incarnate that He might blot it out: He has no stain of it on Himself. If we render the word "bear," this coherence is lost. Of course this fact is in the background, that He took them away by bearing them Himself: but it is not brought out, only the antagonism between Him and sin. See, on the word, the note on John i. 29) sins (all sins, not merely certain sins. The object of His manifestation is stated not only categorically, but definitively. Compare the striking parallel, Heb. ix. 26): and in Him sin is not (as His work, in being manifested, was, altogether to take away sin, so likewise is He himself free from all spot of sin. On the perversions and misunderstandings of this verse by the rationalists, and by Calvin, see in my Greek Test.).

6.] The connexion see above. Every one that abideth in Him (this expression is not to be weakened down by any rationalistic interpretation as believing in Christ, or being joined in love to Christ. This a man might be to an earthly friend: but could not be said to abide in him. See the sense expanded in the note on ch. ii. 24. Nothing short of personal immanence in the personal Christ will satisfy the words: a living because He lives, and as receiving of His fulness) sinneth not (nor again is this to be tamed down, as has been done by far more and better interpreters than in the last case, by making it mean "does not persist in sin," so Luther, "does not allow sin to reign over him,"—so the Socinians and semi-Socinians. Against all such the plain words of the Apostle must be held fast, and explained by the analogy of his way of speaking throughout the Epistle of the ideal reality of the life of God and the life of sin as absolutely excluding one another. This all the best and deepest Commentators have felt: so Augustine and Bede, saying, "In so far as he abideth in Him, he sinneth not." The two are incompatible: and in so far as a man is found in the one, he is thereby separated from the other. In the child of God is the hatred of sin; in the child of the devil the love of it; and every act done in virtue of either state or as belonging to either, is done purely on one side or purely on the other. If the child of God falls into sin, it is an act against nature, deadly to life, hardly endured, and bringing bitter repentance: it is as the taking of a poison, which if it be not corrected by its antidote, will sap the very springs of life. So that there is no real contradiction to ch. i. 8—10, ii. 2, where this very falling into sin of the child of God is asserted and the remedy prescribed. The real difficulty of our verse is in that which follows; every one that sinneth hath not seen (so literally: see below) Him, neither hath known Him (here it seems to be said that the act of sinning not only so far excludes from the life in God and Christ, but proves that that life has never existed in the person so sinning. That this cannot be the meaning of the Apostle, is evident from such passages as i. 8—10, ii. 2, and indeed from the whole tenor of the Epistle, in which the words, "now are we children of God," occur in combination with

"let no one deceive you," and the like: whereas if the above view were correct, the very fact of being deceived not only would cause them to cease from being children of God, but would prove that they never had been such. If then this cannot be so, what meaning are we to put upon the words? First observe the tense in which the verbs stand in the original. They are perfects, almost equivalent to our English present, by which I have accordingly rendered them. And the meaning will be, that the cutting off by an act of sin of the sight and knowledge of Christ, shews, and shews in proportion as it prevails, unreality in that sight and knowledge. See the force of the tense discussed in my Greek Testament.

As regards the relation of the words themselves, seeth and knoweth; some hold that there is no perceptible difference: but that the latter word fixes and specifies the necessarily figurative meaning of the former. Lücke would understand "seeing" of knowledge obtained by historical information, which matures and completes itself into "knowing." But this seems hardly according to St. John's practice, who uses "seeing" either of bodily sight [John i. 18, 1 John i. 1, &c., &c.],—or of an intuitive immediate vision of divine things, such as Christ has of the Father and heavenly things [John iii. 11, 32, vi. 46, viii. 38],—or of spiritual intuition gained by knowledge of Christ and the divine life [John xiv. 7, 9; 3 John 11]: and there can be little doubt that this last is the meaning here: and thus neither will retain its proper exclusive and climacteric force: seeing is a further step than knowing: a realization of Christ's personality and of the existence of heavenly things which is the result of spiritual knowledge: and thus the sinner "hath not seen Him, nor yet, nor even, known Him").

because the devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the in St. John's repetitions, a new feature is brought in, which the following verses take up and further treat: viz. that the devil is the source of such practices of sin.

7.] Little children, let no one deceive you (it does not seem that any particular false teacher is here in St. John's view; but he alludes to all who would sever ethical likeness to God from the Christian life): he that doeth righteousness (the righteousness spoken of is but one, and that God's: the righteousness which is His) is righteous, even as He (here apparently, God, notwithstanding the apparent parallel of "Jesus Christ the righteous" in ch. ii. 2: for we are by this saying, as by that in ver. 3,—where see note,—referred back to the great Source of our spiritual birth, ch. ii. 29, and our likeness to Him insisted on) is righteous.

This verse has absolutely nothing to do with the sense which the Roman-Catholic expositors have endeavoured to extract from it, that good works make us righteous before God. This is altogether to invert the proposition of the Apostle, who is reasoning, not from the fact of doing good works to the conclusion that a man is righteous, but from the hypothesis of a man's being a child of God, born of Him and like Him, to the necessity of his purifying himself and doing righteousness. And in doing this, he ascribes the doing righteousness to its source, and the doing sin to its source: the one man is of God, the other is of the devil. As Luther well says, "Good works of piety do not make a good pious man, but a good pious man does good pious works. . . . Fruits grow from the tree, not the tree from fruits."

8.] Contrast to ver. 7. He that doeth sin is of the devil (notice first "he that doeth [not, as the A. V. most unfortunately, "committeth"] sin," as indicative not so much of individual acts as of a state, corresponding to "he that doeth righteousness." And then the words, is of the devil, must not be rationalized away, as is done by those who deny the personal existence of the devil. It is the distinct opposite correlative of "is of God" [ver. 10, &c.], and implies a personal root and agency, just as much as that other does. But again, it does not imply any physical dualism on the part of the Apostle, "The devil made no one, begat no one, created no one," says Augustine here; "but he who imitates the devil, as if born of him, becomes a son of the devil, by imitation, not by birth. All sinners are born of the devil, in so far as they are sinners. Adam was made by God: but when he consented to the devil, he was born of the devil, and begat all such as he himself was." But he it observed, that we have here no such expression as "hath been begotten of the devil," but only, is of the devil. In the case of the children of God, there is a definite time, known to Him, when they passed from death unto life [ch. ii. 29; iii. 14; v. 11; John i. 12; iii. 3 ff.; v. 24, &c.]: from which their new life unto God dates: but there is no such point in the life of those who are the children of the devil; no regeneration from beneath corresponding to that from above: the natural life of men is not changed by seed of the devil as it is by seed of God. Rather may we say, that in those who are of the devil this latter change has never taken place. Since sin has come to reign in the world by man's sin, our natural birth, which is properly and essentially a birth from God, a creation by the eternal Word, has become a birth from the devil: so that it is, as Bengel expresses it, "a corruption, not a generation;" and there is no trace of a physical dualism in St. John's doctrine: nay, the idea is at once precluded by the fact that according to the Apostle [John i. 12] those who are children of God have become so from having been children of the devil: because the devil sinneth from the beginning ('sinned in the beginning, and has never ceased to sin since.' But the question meets us, what is from the beginning? Bede and others understand it of the beginning of all creation. Many Commentators, to avoid all chance of dualism, make it mean not from the time of his creation, but from that of his fall, understanding it of the beginning of our world. But again, others suppose the term to mark the beginning of the devil's own apostacy: so Bengel, &c. And lastly, others again take it to mean, "from the time when any began to sin." And this seems, when we compare John viii. 44, to be the true interpretation. He has ever been the depository, as it were, of the thought and the life of sin: the tempter to sin: the fountain out of which sin has come, as God is the fountain out of which has come righteousness. See on this subject, my Sermons on Divine Love, Sermon. v. pp. 68 ff., "the First Sinner"). To this end was the Son of God manifested (viz. in His incarnation, pregnant with all its consequences), that He might destroy (do away, break up, pull down: the word is used of a building, or a law, or an organized whole) the works of the devil (what are these? Clearly, in the first place, works whereof the devil is the author: not merely devilish works. And then, are we to include in the list not only sins, which manifestly belong to it, but also the consequences of sin—pain, sorrow, death? The fact would be true if we did: for Christ hath abolished death [2 Tim. i. 10]. But the context seems to require that we should at all events keep death and the results of sin in the background, as no mention is made of them here, and sinful works are clearly in the Apostle's mind. These works the whole manifestation of Christ went directly to nullify: more especially His Death, in which His power over Satan reached its highest point,—the bruising of His heel, in which He bruised the Enemy's head:—for it was in that, that He won for us that acceptance which is sealed by His glorification, and in virtue of which the Holy Spirit is given us, of whose work in us it is said that we "by the Spirit mortify (put to death) the deeds of the body." Rom. viii. 13).

9, 10.] The contrast taken up again, and from the converse: he that is born of God cannot sin: he that does not righteousness, is not of God: i. e. is a child of the devil. Then we have the usual new particular, to give the transition note to that which is to follow,—including in this last category him that loveth not his brother. Every one that is begotten of God, doeth not sin (the meaning of this declaration has been treated of above, ver. 6. Here we meet it in its barest and plainest form—the two states, being begotten of God, and sin, absolutely excluding one another), because His seed abideth in him (i. e. because that new principle of life from which his new life has unfolded, which was God's seed deposited in him, abides growing there, and precludes the development of the old sinful nature. Some of the ancients understood it of the word of God, as in the parable of the sower, Matt. xiii. 3 ff. This last interpretation has been impugned by all the moderns, but I cannot see that they have made good their objection: the force of which amounts to this; that the word of God is not so much the Seed, as the means whereby the begetting to the new life takes place. But whether we regard the generation of plants, or animal procreation, which latter is more in question here, what words can more accurately describe the office of the seed than these? and what is the word of God but the continually abiding and working seed of the new life, in the child of God? Nay, it seems to be that exactly of which we are in search: not the Holy Spirit, the personal agent; not the power of the new life, the thing begotten; but just that which intervenes between the two, the word, the utterance of God—dropped into the soul of man, taking it up by divine power into itself, and developing the new life continually. This is in the most precise and satisfactory sense the seed of God: and on this all Scripture symbolism is agreed: compare 1 Pet. i. 23, James i. 18. In fact the very passage which is the key to this, is John v. 38, "Ye have not His word abiding in you." Nor should any exception have been taken to the comparison with the parable of the Sower, for though the attendant circumstances of generation are different, the analogy is the same); and he cannot sin (no explaining away of this declaration must be attempted, as is done by Cornelius-a-lapide, who understands it of deadly sin; by Augustine and Bede, who confine the to sin to the violation of brotherly love. The Apostle is speaking not only of the ideal, but of the real state of those born of God: drawing the strongest possible contrast between the life of God and the life of sin, as excluding one another absolutely. And there is no contradiction between what is here said and ch. i. 8, 9; nay, rather that passage shews, by the strong desire to be cleansed from all sin, which it assumes, the same incompatibility as is here insisted on, because he hath been begotten of God (almost all the expositors, from the first times until now, make this because more or less represent in as far as, or as long as. It is true, the Apostle does not say, "he cannot sin because he was born of God:" this would testify to a past fact, once for all occurring, without any reference to its present permanence: but he has said because he is [hath been and continues] born,—because he has abiding in him that his birth from God. So that the above-cited explanation, though falling far short of the real meaning, has at least a feeling after the truth of the Apostle's assertion in it. The abiding force of this divine generation in a man, excludes sin: where sin enters, that force does not abide: the having been born is in danger of becoming a mere fact in the past, instead of a fact in the present: a lost life, instead of a living life. And so all such passages as this, instead of testifying, as Calvin would have this one do, to the doctrine of final perseverance of the regenerate, do in fact bear witness to the very opposite: viz., that, as the Church of England teaches, we need God's special grace every day to keep us in the state of salvation, from which every act and thought of sin puts us in peril of falling away.

Before leaving this important passage, I must quote Düsterdieck's concluding remarks. "The difference between the older and more modern expositors lies in this, that the former are more anxious to moderate the details of the Apostle's sentiment, and to tone down his assertion to the actual life of Christians, while the moderns recognize the full precision of the text as it stands, but then remind us that the ideal truth of the principle announced by St. John continually, so to speak, floats above the actual life of believers as their rule and aim, and that, in so far, the Apostle's saying finds in such actual life only a relative fulfilment. None however of all the expositors, who in any way has recognized the ideal character of St. John's view, has overlooked the fact, that even in the actual life of all that are born of God there is something which in full verity answers to the ideal words, 'they cannot sin.' The children of God, in whom the divine seed of their eternal life abides, have, in reality, a holy privilege,—they sin not, and they cannot sin, just in proportion as the new divine life, unconditionally opposed to all sin, and manifesting itself in godlike righteousness, is present and abides in them. Expositors of all theological tendencies, in all times, point to this, that the new life of believers, veritably begotten by regeneration from God, is simply incompatible with sin;—the life which essentially alienates the spirit from all sin, fills it with an irreconcilable hate against every sin, and urges it to an unceasing conflict against all unrighteousness. Luther excellently says, that a child of God in this conflict receives indeed wounds daily, but never throws away his arms or makes peace with his deadly foe. Sin is ever active, but no longer dominant: the normal direction of life's energies in the believer is against sin, is an absence of sin, a no-will-to-sin and a no-power-to-sin. He that is born of God has become, from being a servant of sin, a servant of righteousness: according to the divine seed remaining in him, or, as St. Paul says, according to the inner man [Rom. vii. 15 ff.], he will, and he can work only that which is like God,—righteousness, though the flesh, not yet fully mortified, rebels and sins: so that even in and by the power of the new life sin must be ever confessed, forgiveness received [ch. i. 8 ff.], the temptation of the evil one avoided and overcome [v. 18], and self-purification and sanctification carried on").

10.] The continuation of the former argument: with the insertion, in the latter half, of the new particular which is to form the argument of the next section. But this latter half belongs not only to that next section, but to this as well: its assertion "whosoever doeth not righteousness, &c.," is requisite for the carrying out fully of the assertion, "In this, &c.," which at the same time looks backward and forward: backward, for the children of God have already been designated by the absence of sin, ver. 9: forward, for the children of the devil are designated below by the presence of sin in the second half of the verse. In this (fact, circumstance: in better than by this, which gives the idea that this is the only sign) are manifest (it has been asked, to whom? Some say to God's unerring eye alone. True, in the full and deep truth of the saying: but surely in degree and proportion to those whom the unction from the Holy One enables to know all things: in proportion as sin is manifested, or hatred and avoidance of sin is manifested, in a character. And the especial sign which follows, the sin of hate, is one which is plainly open to men's eyes, at least in its ordinary manifestations) the children of God and the children of the devil (see these expressions explained and vindicated from the charge of dualism, above, ver. 8. Compare John viii. 44, Acts xiii. 10. Socinus remarks well, "From the Apostle's words it may clearly enough be collected, that between the sons of God and the sons of the devil there are none intermediate"): every one that doeth not righteousness (see ch. ii. 29) is not of God (is not a child of God), and he that loveth not his brother (see below, these words pointing on to the next section).

11—24.] Of brotherly love, as the sum and essence of righteousness: as Christ's command [ver. 11]: whereas in the world there is hate [12, 13]: bound up with life, as hate with death [14, 15]: finding its great pattern in Christ [16]: to be testified not in word only but in deed [17, 18]: as the ground of confidence toward God and the granting of our prayers to Him, being obedience to His will [19—22]: which obedience consists in faith and love [23], and is testified to by the witness of His Spirit [24].

Before entering on ver. 11, the latter half of ver. 10 must be considered, as belonging properly, in its sense, to this section, though in arrangement inseparable from the last. The "and," which binds on the additional particular in the last clause, serves, as in ver. 5, to co-ordinate that clause with the foregoing: not in this case as excluded from the forementioned category, but as one particular, taken out from among the general category, and put into a co-ordinate position with it. And it is thus put, as being the most eminent, and most of the nature of a summary, and criterion, of the rest, of any of those graces which are necessarily involved in righteousness. Augustine beautifully says, "Love alone distinguishes between the children of God and the children of the devil. All may sign themselves with the sign of the cross of Christ: all may answer Amen: all may sing Halleluia: all may be baptized, may enter churches, may build the walls of the same: but the children of God are not distinguished from the children of the devil, except by Love." And this love, thus constituted into the great test and touchstone, is necessarily the family love of brother for brother within the limits of those who are begotten of God. Universal love to man is a Christian grace—but it is not that here spoken of: it neither answers the description of the "message" given in ver. 11, nor corresponds to the context here in general, the drift of which is that a test of our belonging to God's family is our love towards His children, who are our brethren in that family: cf. ch. v. 1 ff. But, while there can be no doubt that this is the right understanding of the brotherly love here insisted on, we incur at once a formal difficulty in applying this meaning to the negative or exclusive side of the test. He who does not love his brother, has in strict fact no brother to love, for he is not a child of God at all. Hence we must understand, strictly speaking, "his brother" in this case as importing his hypothetical brother: him who would be, were he himself a true child of God, a brother, and, if so, necessarily beloved. That this love does not exist in him, demonstrates him not to be of God's family.

the message which ye heard from the beginning (the announcement which from the beginning of the preaching of the Gospel was made to you. The term message is not here equivalent to command, though that which is cited is a commandment: but it is a command conveyed in words and by messengers, and thus become a message) is this, that we love one another.

12.] Not as Cain was, of the wicked one, and slew his brother (the construction is elliptic: but nothing need be supplied as in A. V. In the words was of the wicked one we have a resumption of the expression "is of the devil" from above, ver. 8: the word wicked being used probably on account of his being of the wicked one following. Observe, "his works were wicked" is the inference from that great proof which he gave of it by killing his brother: as is also the reason given in what follows: see below. So that here the assertion of his being of the wicked one is, as above, strictly ethical, and in no way physical or dualistic: "Cain was the son not of God but of the devil, not by generation, but by imitation and suggestion." Cornelius-a-lapide). And for what reason slew he him? because his [own] works were wicked, and those of his brother righteous (it has caused some difficulty, that no mention of this ethical difference is made in the narrative in Genesis. It has been supposed that the Apostle gathers it from God's differing acceptance of the offerings of the two: others have called the ethical characters of the two the previous occasion, whereas the immediately exciting cause was the deduction from acknowledged facts, of the murder. But properly considered, the Apostle's assertion here is only a proximate occasion. Cain murdered his brother: therefore he hated him: and hate belongs to the children of the evil one,—classes him at once among those whose works are evil, and who hate those who, like Abel, are testified to [Heb. xi. 4] that they are of the children of God who work righteousness. Whatever might be the exciting occasion of the murder, this lay at the root—the hatred which the children of the devil ever bear to the children of God).

13.] The connexion with ver. 12 is close: the world (the children of the devil) began so, and will ever go on as it began. Marvel not, brethren, if (no doubt is expressed by this if. The hypothesis is set forth as actually fulfilled) the world hateth you (this verse is in close sequence on the example just given: Cain being taken as the prototype and exemplar of such hate).

14, 15.] See summary above, on ver. 11. The connexion with the foregoing is very close. We learnt from ver. 10, that the love of the brethren is that which makes manifest the children of God and the children of the devil. And now again, having spoken of the hate of the world as a thing to be looked for, the Apostle brings up this sign as one tending to comfort the child of God, and shew him that, notwithstanding the world's hate, he has more to rejoice at than to fear from the fact: he is in life, they in death. We (emphatic: we whom the world hates: we, as set over against the world) know (see above, ver. 2: of certain knowledge) that we have passed over out of death into life (in the original it is, out of the death into the life—the death, which reigns over the unregenerate: the life, which is revealed in Christ), because (gives the ground and cause, not of the having passed over, but of the knowledge of having passed over) we love the brethren (here distinctly, our Christian brethren: the term being that well-known one not his brother abideth in death. <sup>15</sup> Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. <sup>16</sup> Hereby perceive we the

by which the body of Christians was represented. For the Romanist and Socinian distortions of this verse, curiously running into one, see note in my Greek Test. It may conduce to a right estimate of the doctrines of men and churches, and put younger Scripture students on their guard, to see the concurrent habits and tendencies of interpreters apparently so opposite. When Pilate and Herod are friends, we know what work is in hand. But as a conclusion, I will quote the clear and faithful exposition of a greater and better man: "What do we know? that we have passed from death into life. Whence have we this knowledge? because we love the brethren. Let no one interrogate a man: let every one have recourse to his own heart: if he find there brotherly love, he may be sure that he has passed from death into life. He stands already on the right hand: let it not trouble him that as yet his glory is hidden; when the Lord shall come, then shall he appear in glory. For he is growing, but as yet in winter: the root grows, but the branches are as it were dried up: within is the sap which grows, within are the leaves of trees, within are fruits, but they wait for summer"); he that loveth not (there is this time no qualifying object, as "his brother:" the absence of love from the character is the sign spoken of), abideth in death (as before, "in the death:" in that realm of death, in which all men are by nature. Here again the absence of love is not the reason, why he remains in death; but the sign of his so remaining. The "passing over" has not passed upon him. The words have no reference to future death, any further than as he who is and abides in death can but end in death: we may notice that he does not say, he who loveth not shall come into death, as if he were speaking concerning eternal punishment, awaiting sinners in the future: but he says, "he who loveth not abideth in death," Bede). <sup>15.</sup> Every one that hateth his brother is a manslayer (in these words, (1) "he that loveth not," which preceded, is taken up by every one that

hateth: shewing that the two are identical: the living spirit of man being incapable of a state of indifference: that he who has banished brotherly love has in fact abandoned himself to the rule of the opposite state. In the ethical depth of the Apostle's view, love and hate, like light and darkness, life and death, necessarily succeed, as well as necessarily exclude, one another. He who has not the one of necessity has the other in each case. (2) he who hates his brother is stated to be a manslayer. The example given, ver. 12, shewed the true and normal result of hate: and again in the Apostle's ethical depth of view, as in our Lord's own [Matt. v. 21 ff., 27 ff.], he who falls under a state, falls under the normal results of that state carried out to its issue. If a hater be not a murderer, the reason does not lie in his hate, but in his lack of hate. "Whom we hate, we wish destroyed," says Calvin. Some would make a manslayer mean, a destroyer of his own soul. But this, as well as the view that it is the murder of his brother's soul which is intended, by provoking him to anger and discord,—errs by pressing the reference to the example of Cain above. Some again would interpret it by a reference to John viii. 44, understood as pointing to the ruin of Adam by the Tempter. But as Dürstendieck remarks, far rather should we say that this passage throws back a light on that passage, and makes it likely that the case of Cain, and not that of Adam, is there referred to; and ye know that every manslayer hath not (is without the possession of) eternal life abiding in him (ye know, viz. by your own knowledge of what is patent and axiomatic in itself. We must not fall into the error of referring the saying to the future lot of the murderer: it regards his present state, and is another way of saying that he "abideth in death," ver. 14. Eternal life, which abides in God's children, which is the living growth of the seed of God in them, is evidenced by love: if the very crown and issue of hate, homicide, be present, it is utterly impossi-

16—18.] Description and enforcement of true love. The Apostle has hitherto shewn that brotherly love is the truest test as between the children of God and the children of the devil. But, that no one may deceive himself or be deceived by others, it is now necessary to lay down, what is true and Christian love.

16.] Example of true love in Christ, and enforcement of it on us. In this (see above, ver. 10, and note, ch. ii. 3) we have the knowledge of ("we have arrived at and possess the apprehension of:" knowledge, as an act of the understanding proceeding on intellectual grounds. Here however it is used entirely within the sphere of the Christian life of union with Christ. None can understand true love as shewn in this its highest example, but he who is one with Christ, and has felt and does feel that love of His in its power on himself. See note on ch. ii. 3) love (i. e. what love is: the nature of love true and genuine: that perfection of love, which we are commending. So most of the Commentators. Some have held to the insertion of the words "of God" (as A. V.) after love, which has hardly any authority. But there can be but little doubt that the other is the right view. The love of God to us is not that which would, as such, be adduced as a pattern to us of brotherly love; it is true that in the depth of the matter, all true love is love after that pattern: but in a passage so logically bound together it is much more probable that the term common to the two, Christ and ourselves, would be, not divine love, which as such is peculiar to Him, but love itself simply, that of which He has given the great example which we are to follow), that He (Christ, as the words beyond question shew) laid down His life for us (i. e. died: not as Grotius, who in all the places where it occurs maintains that it is only to expose life to danger, which would entirely enervate the Apostle's saying here. The term for us carries in it and behind it all that we know of the nature of the death which is spoken of: but the vicariousness and atoning power of Christ's death are not here in consideration: it is looked on here as the greatest possible proof of love, as in John xv. 13): and we (emphatic: we on our part, as followers of Christ) ought on behalf of the brethren to lay down our lives (on lives, Socinus says well: "He says not, that we ought to lay down our 'life,' as if one were bound to die for many, but, our lives, because each ought to die for each." The Apostle states the duty generally: and thus stated it is clear enough. As Christ did in pursuance of His love, so ought we to do in pursuance of ours, bound as we are to Him not by the mere force of an outward example, but by the power of an inward life. But naturally and necessarily the precept finds its application only in those cases where our Heavenly Father's will sets the offering of such a sacrifice in the course and pursuance of our brotherly love, which He has ordained).

17.] But ("by the adversative connexion of ver. 17 with ver. 16 the Apostle marks the passage from the greater, which is justly demanded of us, to the lesser, the violation of which is all the more a transgression of the law just prescribed." Düsterdieck) whosoever hath the world's sustenance, and beholdeth (the Greek word gives more than "seeth," which would imply only the casual sight: it is the standing and looking on as a spectator: so that it ever involves not the eye only, but the mind also, in the sight: it is to contemplate, not simply to see. St. John is very fond of this word, and wherever it occurs, this its meaning may be more or less traced. There is then in this unmerciful man not merely the being aware of, but the deliberate contemplation of the distress of his brother) his brother having need, and shutteth up (the shutting is then and there done, as the result of the contemplation: not a mere constitutional hardness of heart, but an act of exclusion from sympathy following deliberately on the beholding of his brother's distress) his bowels (i. e. his heart, the seat of compassion: as so often in the New Test., this expression carries the idea of turning away from him. As Düsterdieck remarks, the fact that a man shuts up his heart against his brother, includes in it the fact that that brother is excluded from the heart thus shut up), how (can it be that? as in ch. iv. 20) doth the love of God (i. e. from the very express filling out of the thought in ch. iv. 20, "love to God;" not God's love to us. See also ch. ii. 5, where we have the same expression and reference to the love of God being in a man. The context indeed here might seem, as the mention of Christ's love to us as so immediately preceded, to require the other meaning; or at least, that of "the love wherof God hath set us a pattern:" and accordingly both these have been held. But I see not how we can escape the force of the passages above cited) abide in him (Lücke and Düsterdieck are disposed to lay a stress on the word abide here, thereby opening a door for the view that the love of God may indeed be in him in some sense, but not as a firm abiding principle; that at all events at the moment when he thus shuts up his bowels of compassion, it is not abiding in him. But this would seem to violate the ideal strictness of the Apostle's teaching, and the true sense rather to be, "How can we think of such an one as at all possessing the love of God in any proper sense?" giving thus much emphasis to the word abide).

Here again, as above in the case of the duty of laying down life for a brother, many questions of casuistry have been raised as to the nature and extent of the duty of almsgiving, on which it is impossible to enter here. The safest answers to them all will be found in the Christian conscience enlightened by the Holy Spirit, guiding the Christian heart warmed by the living presence of Christ)?

18.] Exhortation to true brotherly love: following naturally on the example of the want of it given in the last verse. Little children, let us not love with word, nor yet with tongue, but (let us love) in deed and truth (there is some little difficulty in assigning these words their several places in the contrast. Notice first, that the two former, with word and with tongue, simply relate to the instrument, whereas the two latter are introduced by the preposition in, denoting the element in which. The true account of the arrangement seems to be, that the usual contrast of word and deed is more sharply defined by the explanatory terms, tongue and truth: with the tongue giving, by making the mere bodily member the instrument, more precisely the idea of absence of truth than even with word, and in truth more definitely the idea of its presence than even in deed. As connected with the exhortation in this verse, I may cite the tradition reported by Jerome in his Commentary on Gal. vi. 10: "The blessed John, the Evangelist, living on at Ephesus into extreme old age, and being with difficulty borne by the hands of his disciples to church, when he could not sustain his utterance for more words, used to say no more at each meeting than this: 'Little children, love one another.' At last his disciples and the brethren who were present, being wearied at hearing always the same words, said, 'Master, why dost thou always go on saying this?' The answer was worthy of St. John: 'Because it is the Lord's command; and if this only be done, it is enough'").

19-24.] See the summary at ver. 11. The blessed effects of true brotherly love as a test of the Christian state.

19, 20.] [And] in this (see above, vv. 10, 16. It here refers to what had gone before: viz. to the fulfilment of the exhortation in ver. 18, as the future shews: "which thing if we do, . . .") we shall know (on the future, see above. It is the result consequent on the fulfilment of the condition implied in herein) that we are of the truth ("i. e.," says Genmenius, "in the fact of our loving not with word, but in deed and in truth: because he who says one thing and does another, not in his deed being consonant to his profession, is a liar and not true." But, true as this is, and self-evident, it does not reach the depth of the meaning of, have our source from. To be in the truth, is a different matter from to be truthful or true men. Estius approaches the meaning, understanding the truth to be the truth of God in His promises, and so are of the truth to mean "are of the number of the elect." Bede's interpretation, "of the truth, which is God," in which Calvin and others agree, is nearer still: but had the Apostle intended this, he surely would have written "of God." The Lutheran commentators have come nearer still, making the truth to be the word of truth by which we are begotten anew unto God. But why stop at that which after all is itself of the truth? why not mount up to the Truth itself, that pure and objective Truth which is the common substratum and essential quality of the Spirit Himself, of the Word, of those who are born of the Word by the Spirit?, and shall persuade our hearts before him (i. e. and in and by this same sign, shall still the questionings of our hearts before God, by the assurance that we are His true children. St. John uses the heart for the innermost seat of our feelings and passions: of alarm [John xiv. 1, 27], of mourning [xvi. 6], of joy [xvi. 22]. It was into the heart of Judas that the devil put the intent of betraying the Lord [xiii. 2]: and the heart here is the inward judge of the man,—whose office is, so to say, promoted by the conscience, accusing or else excusing [Rom. ii. 15]. Then, as to shall persuade, there is no need to give to the verb any unusual meaning. It does not mean "quiet" or "assure," except in so far as its ordinary import, "persuade," takes this tinge from the context.

It must be plain from what has been said, that the future, shall persuade, is not, on account of the words "before Him," to be taken as referring to the future day of judgment, as some have done. In ch. iv. 17, which is in some respects parallel with this, that day is expressly named: whereas in our passage, an equally clear indication is given, by the parallelism of the two future verbs, "shall know" and "shall persuade," that no such reference is intended. before Him is not, at His appearing, but, in His sight, as placed before His all-seeing eye.

20.] takes up this matter of the persuading our hearts before God, and shews its true importance and rationale. This is carried on in the following verses, but is here and in ver. 21 placed as its ground. If our heart, before Him, judges us unfavourably—we may be quite sure that He, knowing more than our heart does, judges us more unfavourably still: if our heart condemn us not, again before Him, judging and seeing in the light of His countenance, then we know that we are at one with Him, and those consequences follow, which are set forth in ver. 22.

The many difficulties which occur in rendering this verse cannot be presented to the mere English reader. They will be found discussed in my Greek Test. The context appears to stand thus. The Apostle in ver. 19 has said that by the presence of genuine love we shall know that we are of the truth, and shall persuade our hearts in God's presence. He then proceeds to enlarge on this persuading our hearts in general. If our heart condemn us, what does it import? If our heart acquit us, what? The condemnation, and acquittal, are plainly and necessarily opposed, both in hypothesis and in result. If the consolatory view of ver. 20 is taken,—as softening our self-condemnation by the comforting thought of God's greatness and infinite mercy,—then the general result of vv. 20, 21 will be, whether our heart condemn us or not, we have comfort and assurance: and then what would be the import of our persuading our hearts at all? But on the other interpretation, the condemnatory sense of ver. 20—as intensifying our self-condemnation by the thought that the cause of it is God, knowing more of our sin than we do—then, taken with some modifications, all will be clear. I say, taken with some modifications: because the sense has been much obscured by the mistake of introducing the particular case treated in ver. 18 into the general statements of vv. 20, 21. It is not, If our heart condemn us for want of brotherly love: but this test is dropped, and the general subject of the testimony of our hearts is entered upon. Thus we get the context and rendering, as follows): because (as if it were said, and this persuading our hearts before Him is for us a vital matter, seeing that condemnation and acquittal by our own hearts bring each such a weighty conclusion with it) if our heart condemn us, it is because (our self condemnation is founded on the fact, that) God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things (i. e. the condemning testimony of our conscience is not alone, but is a token of One sitting above our conscience and greater than our conscience: because our conscience is but the faint echo of His voice who knoweth all things: if it condemn us, how much more He? and therefore this persuading, for which this verse renders a reason, becomes a thing of inestimable import, and one which we cannot neglect, seeing that the absence of it is an index to our standing condemned of God. And then, having given the reason why the condemnation should be set at rest by the persuasion, he goes on to give the blessed results of the persuasion itself in vv. 21, 22). 21.] Beloved (there is no adversative particle, because this address throws up the contrast quite strongly enough, as introducing the very matter on which the context lays the emphasis, viz., the persuading our hearts), if our heart condemn us not, we have confidence towards God (said generally; not with direct reference to that which follows ver. 22, which indeed is one form of this confidence: see ch. v. 14, where the connexion is similar. The confidence here spoken of is of course present, not future in the day of judgment. towards God, i. e., with reference to God: but more than that: to God-ward, in our aspect as turned towards and looking to God. It must be remembered that the words are said in the full light of the reality of the Christian state,—where the heart is awakened and enlightened, and the testimony of the Spirit is active: where the heart's own deceit does not come into consideration as a disturbing element), 22.] and (such another "and" as that in verse 10 above, where, after the general statement, "and" introduced the particular instance in which the general truth was carried forward. The Apostle is setting forth actual matter of fact) from Him (these words must be taken in all their simplicity, without capricious and arbitrary limitations. Like all the sayings of St. John, they proceed on the ideal truth of the Christian state. "The child of God," as Huther says, "asks for nothing which is against the will of its Father"), because (ground of the above receiving) we keep His commandments, and do the things which are pleasing in His sight (on the last expression [and parallelism] see Exod. xv. 26; also Deut. vi. 18, xii. 25, Ezra x. 11, Isa. xxxviii. 3. It is added, not as explanatory of keeping His commandments, but to connect with His granting our prayers, since our lives are in accord with His good pleasure. This however brings us to the theological difficulty of our verse, wherein it would seem at first sight as if the granting of our prayers by God depended, as its meritorious efficient, on our keeping of His commandments and doing that which pleases Him. And so some of the Roman-Catholic expositors here. But both here and elsewhere the solution of the difficulty is very easy, if separated from the party words of theology, and viewed in the light of Scripture itself. Christ is not won nor merited by them. In Christ, every work done of faith is good and is pleasing to God. The doing of such works is the working of the life of Christ in us: they are its sign, they its fruits: they are not of us, but of it and of Him. They are the measure of our Christian life: according to their abundance, so is our access to God, so is our reward from God: for they are the steps of our likeness to God. Whatever is attributed to them as an efficient cause, is attributed not to us, but to Him whose fruits they are. Because Christ is thus manifested in us, God hears our prayers, which He only hears for Christ's sake: because His Spirit works thus abundantly in us, He listens to our prayer, which in that measure has become the voice of His Spirit. So that no degree of efficacy attributed to the good works of the child of God need surprise us: it is God recognizing, God vindicating, God multiplying, God glorifying, His own work in us. So that when, e.g., Cornelius-a-lapide says, "It is congruous, and the congruous reward of obedience and reconciliation (friendship), that if man does the will of God, God in His turn should do the will of man," all we can reply is that such a duality, such a reciprocity, does not exist for Christians: we are in God, He in us: and this St. John continually insists on. We have no claim from without: He works in us to do of His good pleasure: and the works which He works, which we work, manifest before Him, and before all, that we are His children. The assertion, "whatsoever we ask, we receive," I reserve to be treated of on ch. v. 14, 15, where it is set forth more in detail).

<sup>23.</sup> Summing up of all these commandments in one: faith in Christ, and brotherly love according to Christ's command. And (see "and" similarly used, ch. i. 5, ii. 17, iii. 3) His commandment ("he mentions," says Bede, "but one commandment, and then subjoins two, faith and love, as being inseparable the one from the other. For we cannot love one another rightly without the faith of Christ, nor can we truly believe in the name of Jesus Christ without love") is this, That we should believe the name (this unusual expression is well explained by Calvin and Beza,—the word "name" has reference to the preaching of Him; so that to believe His Name is, to believe the Gospel message concerning Him, and Him as living in it, in all His fulness) of His Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, even as He gave us commandment (it seems natural, with the generality of Commentators, to understand Christ as intended by He, and by the commandment, John xiii. 34, xv. 12, xvi. 17).

<sup>24</sup> a.] General return, with reference to what has been said in the last verses, to the great key-note of the Epistle, abide in Him, with which the former part of it concluded, ch. ii. 28. This keeping of His (God's) commandments is the abiding in God: this of which brotherly love is the first and most illustrious example and summary. So that the exhortation given at the beginning of this portion of the Epistle is still in the Apostle's mind, as again ch. iv. 15, 16, and v. 20; see also ch. ii. 6, iii. 6, 9. And he that keepeth His (God's) commandments, abideth in Him (God), and He (God) in him (some hold that He and Him are to be referred to Christ. And no doubt they would be perfectly true, and according to our Lord's own words, when thus applied: see John xiv. 15, xv. 5 ff. Still, from the context [see below], it is better to refer them to the chief subject, viz. to God. In the sense, the difference is not important. It is one of the most difficult questions in the explanation of this most difficult of Epistles, to assign such expressions as the present definitely to their precise personal object).

<sup>24</sup> b.] And of one part of this mutual indwelling there is a sign and token, given us by God Himself, viz. the Holy Spirit. By the mention of the Spirit, the Apostle makes these words the note of transition to the subject of the next section, ch. iv. 1–6, which is parenthetical, of the discerning of true and false spirits, and after which the main subject of brotherly love is resumed again. And in this we (all the children of God; not, as the Roman-Catholic expositors, the Apostles, or the apostolic church, only) know that He abideth in us, from (or by —out of the fact) the Spirit which He gave us (not, hath given, as A. V. The giving here took place at a certain time, by a definite act, viz. on the day of Pentecost, when the Father bestowed the Holy Spirit on the Church. And this word gave is one sign that the whole is to be referred to the Father: seeing that our Lord says, “I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, the Spirit of Truth,” John xiv. 16. This indwelling Spirit of God is to the child of God the spring and source of his spiritual life, the sure token of his sonship, Rom. viii. 14, 15, Gal. iv. 6, and of his union with God in Christ).

CHAP. IV. 1–6.] Warning against, and criteria whereby to distinguish, false teaching. This passage takes up again, with reference to this portion of the Epistle, the similar warning given in the former portion, ch. ii. 18 ff. It is intimately connected with what has immediately preceded. By brotherly love we are to know that we are of the truth, iii. 19,—and the token that He abideth in us is to be the Spirit which He gave us. This Spirit, the Spirit of Truth, it becomes then all-important for us to be able to distinguish, and not to be led astray by any false spirits pretending to his character and office. Such false spirits there are, which are not of God, but of the world, and which make up that spirit of antichrist, of which prophecy had already spoken.

1.] Beloved (so ver. 7, and ch. iii. 2, 21, marking a transition to a subject on which the Apostle affectionately bespeaks their earnest attention), believe not every spirit (this expression, as also, “the spirits,” indicating plurality of spirits, are to be explained by the fact that both the Spirit of Truth and the spirit of error speak by the spirits of men who are their organs. So we have, in reference to prophecy, 1 Cor. xiv. 32, “The spirits of prophets are subject to prophets.” By the nature of the testimony of the human spirits, we shall know whether they are of God or not; whether they are organs of the spirit of truth, or of the spirit of error. It will be observed that this interpretation of “every spirit,” and the Apostle’s way of speaking, rest on the assumption of there being One Spirit of Truth, from God, and one spirit of error, from the world; as opposed to all rationalizing interpretations, and also to all figurative understanding of the word. It is not the men themselves, but their spirits as the vehicles of God’s Spirit or the spirit of antichrist, that are in question), but try the spirits (this trying is enjoined not on the church by her prelates, as the Roman-Catholic expositors, but on all believers, as even some of them reluctantly admit: and the test is one of plain matter of fact, of which any one can be judge. The Church by her rulers is the authoritative assessor of the result of this trial in the shape of official adoption or rejection, but only as moved by her component faithful members, according to whose sense those her formularies are drawn, of which her authorities are the exponents) whether they are of God (bear the character of an origin from Him); because (ground for the necessity of this trial) many false-prophets (called “many antichrists,” ch. ii. 18: prophets, not as foretelling future things, but as the mouth-pieces of the spirit which inspires them. Compare 2 Pet. ii. 1, where the New Test. false teachers are called “false teachers,” and compared to the Old Test. “false prophets”) are gone forth (viz. from him who sent them: even as Jesus Himself is said, John viii. 42, xiii. 3, xvi. 27, 28, to have come forth from God. 2, 3 a.] Test, whereby the spirits are to be tried. In this (see above, ch. iii. 10, &c.) ye know (apprehend, recognize) the Spirit of God (the Holy Spirit, present, inspiring, and working in men's spirits): Every spirit which confesseth (the action is attributed to the spirit, which really is that of the man by the spirit. The confession is necessarily, from the context here, not the genuine and ascertained agreement of lips and life, but the outward and open profession of faith: see 2 John 7—10, where bringing this doctrine is its equivalent) Jesus Christ come in the flesh (not equivalent to, as A. V., “that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh.” If it were, the confession, or the preaching, would be simply of the fact enounced: whereas in each case it is the PERSON who is the object, or primary predicate: the participle carrying the attributive, or secondary predicate. This is abundantly shewn here, by the adversative clause, where it is simply “not confessing Jesus.” The confession required is, “Jesus Christ come in the flesh.” This perfect gives the present endurance of a past historical fact. The words imply the pre-existence and incarnation by their very terms: but they do not assert these doctrines, only the verity of our Lord's human nature), is of God (has its origin and inspiration from Him by His Spirit).

3 a.] conversely: and every spirit which does not confess (literally, by the form of the clause, “refuseth to confess”) Jesus (in the complex of all that He is and has become, involved as it is in His having come in the flesh), is not of God.

3 b.] This has been already virtually explained on ch. ii. 18. And this is the [spirit] of antichrist (so nearly all the Commentators supply the ellipsis, and rightly) [of] which ye have heard (the reference is not to ch. ii. 18, but to the course of their Christian instruction in which this had been taught them) that it cometh (the present used as so often of that which is a thing fixed and determined, without any reference to time: “that it should come” of the A. V. is in sense very good, but does not quite suit the perfect “ye have heard,” which seems grammatically in English to require “that it shall come:” “that it must come” would perhaps be better), and now it is in the world already (viz., in the person of these false prophets, who are its organs).

4.] Ye (so we had ye, ch. ii. 24, 27: his readers clearly and sharply set against the antichristian teachers) are of God, little children (thus he ever speaks to his readers, as being children of God, see ch. iii. 1 ff., 13 ff., 19, 24, &c.), and have overcome (there need not be any evading or softening of this perfect: see ch. ii. 14. It is faith outrunning sight: the victory is certain in Him who said, “I have overcome the world,” John xvi. end. The ground of this assurance follows) them (the false prophets, thus identified with antichrist), because greater is He [that is] in you than he [that is] in the world.

He [that is] in you is most naturally understood of God, seeing that “ye are of God” preceded; for he who is “of God” has God dwelling in him. Though, as Düsterdieck remarks, it matters not much whether we take it thus, or of the indwelling of God by His Spirit, or of the life of Christ in believers.

he [that is] in the world is the devil, the prince of this world. Having said this, he proceeds in the next verse to identify these false prophets with the world of which he has spoken.

5.] They are of the world (this description is not ethical merely, but betokens the origin and source of that which they are and teach, as "ye are of God" did on the other side. That origin and source is the world, unregenerate human nature, ruled over and possessed by the devil, the prince of this world): for this cause they speak of (not concerning, but of, as out of and from; the material of what they say being worldly. Bengel) the world, and the world heareth them (loving as it does its own, who are of it, John xv. 18, from which our verse is mainly taken: see also John viii. 47, xviii. 37).

6.] contrast. We (emphatic, as opposed to them; but who are meant? The Apostles and their companions in the ministry, or all believers? Or again, all teachers of God's truth, the Apostles included? It is hardly likely that the wider meaning has place here, seeing that 1) he has before said "ye are of God," and 2) he is here opposing one set of teachers to another. On the other hand, it is not likely that he should confine what is said to the Apostles only: such as are mentioned with praise in 3 John 5-8 would surely be included) are of God (see above): he that knoweth (apprehendeth: hath any faculty for the knowledge of. The Apostle sets him that knoweth God in the place of him that is of God, as belonging more immediately to the matter in hand, the hearing, and receiving more knowledge. This knowing God, the apprehension and recognition of God, is the peculiar property of God's children, not any natural faculty in which one unrenewed man differs from another)

God heareth us: he who is not of God doth not hear us (here we must remember carefully, what the context is, and what its purpose. The Apostle is giving a test to distinguish, not the children of God from those who are not children of God, but the spirit of truth from the spirit of error, as is clear from the words following. And this he does by saying that in the case of the teachers of the truth, they are heard and received by those who apprehend God, but refused by those who are not of God. It is evident then that these two terms here, "he that knoweth God," and "he that is not of God," represent two patent matters of fact,—two classes open and patent to all: one of them identical with the world above: the other consisting of those of whom it is said above, "Ye know the Father". . . "ye know Him that is from the beginning," ch. ii. 13, 14. How these two classes are what they are, it is not the purpose of this passage to set forth, nor need we here enquire: we have elsewhere tests to distinguish them, ch. iii. 9, 10, and have there gone into that other question. We have a striking parallel, in fact the key to these words, in the saying of our Lord to Pilate, John xviii. 37). From this (viz., not the whole foregoing train of circumstances; nor, those tests proposed in vv. 2, 3: but the facts set forth in vv. 5, 6: the reception of the false teachers by the world: the reception of the true teachers by those that apprehend God, and their rejection by those who are not of God. The same point is touched by our Lord in John x. 8, "but the sheep did not hear them") we know (in this unemphatic first person the Apostle includes his readers: we, all God's children. know, distinguish, recognize, as so often) the Spirit of truth (the Spirit that cometh of God and teacheth truth) and the spirit of error (the spirit that cometh of the devil, teaching lies and seducing men into error: see ch. i. 8, ii. 26).

exhortations to brotherly love, but this time in nearer and deeper connexion with our birth from God, and knowledge of Him who is Himself Love, vv. 7, 8. This last fact he proves by what God has done for us in and by His Son, vv. 9—16: and establishes the necessary connexion between love to God and love to man, vv. 17—21.

The passage is in connexion with what went before, but by links at first sight not very apparent. The great theme of the whole was enounced ch. ii. 29. The consideration of that has passed into the consideration of that righteousness in its highest and purest form of love, which has been recommended, and grounded on His love to us, in ch. iii. 11—18, where the testimony of our hearts came in, and was explained—the great test of His presence in us being the gift of His Spirit, iii. ult. Then from the necessity of distinguishing and being sure of that His Spirit, have been inserted the foregoing tests and cautions respecting truth and error. And now he returns to the main subject. The knoweth God, is and hath been begotten of God, the taking up again of God's love to us in Christ at ver. 9 from ch. iii. 16, the reiteration of the testimony of the Spirit in ver. 13, all serve to shew that we are reading no collection of spiritual apophthegms, but a close and connected argument, though not in an ordinary style.

7, 8.] Beloved (as before, marks the fervency and affection of the Apostle turning to his readers with another solemn exhortation. Here the word is especially appropriate, seeing that his own heart is full of that love which he is enjoining), let us love one another: because (he at once rests the exhortation on the deepest ground) love (abstract, in the widest sense, as the following words shew) is from God (has its origin and source in God: He is the well-spring and centre of all love); and every one that loveth (there is no need to supply an object after loveth, as God is supplied in the Alexandrine MS., and "his brother" in some later versions: indeed to do so would be to narrow the general sense of the Apostle's saying: all love is from God: every one that loveth, taking the word of course in its pure ideal sense in which the assertion follows from the former), hath been begotten of God (has truly received within him that new spiritual life which is of God: see note on ch. ii. 29), and knoweth (in his daily walk and habit, recognizes and is acquainted with God: by virtue of that his divine birth and life) God:

8.] (Contrast, but with some remarkable variations) he that loveth not (general, as before: no object: he that hath not love in him) hath never known God (hath not once known: has never had in him even the beginnings of knowledge of God. So that the past tense makes a far stronger contrast than the present, "knoweth not," would. That is excluded, and much more); because (reason why he who loveth not can never have known God) God is love (love is the very essence, not merely an attribute, of God. It is co-essential with Him: He is all love, love is all of Him: he who has not love, has not God. It is not the place here to enter on the theological import of this weighty and wonderful sentence. It will be found set forth in the first of my Sermons on Divine Love, Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol. iii. But it may be necessary to put in a caution against all inadequate and shallow explanations of the saying: such as that of Grotius (after Socinus), "God is full of love:" Benson, "God is the most benevolent of all beings: full of love to all His creatures:" Whitby, "The Apostle intends not to express what God is in his essence . . . but what He is in demonstration of Himself, shewing great philanthropy to men:" Hammond, "God is made up of love and kindness to mankind:" Calvin, "This it is which is His nature, to love men: . . . he is not speaking of God's essence, but merely teaching what He is felt to be by us," &c. &c. In all these,—in the two last by supplying an object, "men," which is not in the sacred text, the whole force of the axiom as it stands in the Apostle's argument is lost. tial being of God, of what relevance is it, to say that he that loveth not never knew God, because "God is love?" Put for these last words, "God is loving," and we get at once a fallacy: He that loveth not never knew what love is: God is loving: but what would follow? that in as far as God is loving, he never knew Him: but he may have known Him in as far as He is just, or powerful. But take the proposition, God is love, of God's essential being,—as a strict definition of God, and the argumentation will be strict: He that loveth not never knew love: God is love [the terms are co-essential and co-extensive]: therefore he who loveth not never knew God).

9, 10.] Proof of this as far as we are concerned, in God's sending His Son to save us. In this (viz. which follows) the love of God was manifested in regard to us (these words, in regard to us, must be taken with the verb, not with the love of God. Many have thus wrongly connected it, and in consequence have been compelled to distort the in regard to into "towards:" so Luther, &c., and the A.V. Connected then with the verb, it must not be taken as equivalent to "towards," but as "in," i. e. for into the world, "to the world," for only begotten, "dearly beloved," &c., may be seen in Düsterdieck. He well remarks, "Such expositors may naturally be expected to give an answer to the question, how a Christ so understood could be our life [ver. 9], our atonement [ver. 10], or our salvation [ver. 14]." The two emphatic words in the sentence are only-begotten and live. This was the proof, that SUCH a son of God was sent, that we might LIVE).

10.] The same proof particularized in its highest and noblest point, the atonement: and at the same time this brought out, that the love manifested by it was all on God's side, none on ours: was love to us when we were enemies, Rom. v. 8, and therefore all the greater. Ch. iii. 16 is very similar: except that there it is Christ's personal love to us: here the Father's, in sending His Son. In this is love ("in this case," "in this matter," "herein," is, "is found," "exists," Love; in the abstract. This interpretation is necessary, on account of the disjunction which follows. If the word love meant, the love of God just spoken of, then it would be irrelevant to subjoin that this love was not our love to Him but His to us), not that we loved God (the verb refers to an indefinite time past—no act of love of ours to God at any time done furnishes this example of love, but an act of His towards us. It is not the nature of our love to God, as contrasted with His to us, of which the clause treats, but the non-existence of the one love as set against the historical manifestation of the other. Again that "He loved us, though we did not love Him," is so far in the words as it is given by the context [see above], but is not the meaning of the words themselves), but that He loved us (referring again to an act of Love, which is now specified), and (prove this love in that He) sent His Son a propitiation (see on ch. ii. 2) for (see ibid.) our sins (His death being therein

It is not on the one hand any expression of uncertainty: but neither on the other is it exactly equivalent to "since," or "seeing that." We may call it a certainty put in the shape of a doubt, that the hearer's mind may grasp the certainty for itself, not take it from the speaker. "If [it be true that] . . ." is perhaps the nearest English filling up of the sense) God so loved us (so namely as detailed in ver. 10, which, and which alone, is pointed at), we also ought to love one another (the also does not belong to the ought, but purely to the we,—"we, on our side.") But on what does the obligation, asserted in we ought, rest? Clearly, on that relation to God and one another implied by being children of God, which runs through all this section of the Epistle. If we are of God, that love which is in Him, and which He is, will be in us, will make us like Him, causing us to love those who are begotten of Him, ch. v. 1, 2. And of this love, our apprehension of His Love to us will be the motive and the measure).

12.] God hath no one ever beheld (what is the connexion of these words, so suddenly and startlingly introduced? It is evident that ver. 12 is connected with ver. 11, by the words "if we love one another," taking up again "we ought to love one another." But it is also evident that it is connected with ver. 13 by the words "abideth in us," &c. And it is further plain, that these words, God hath no one ever beheld, must have some close reference to loving one another, seeing that they stand between those words in ver. 11, and the resumption of them in ver. 12.

Now on examining ver. 11, we find an unexpected substitution, "if God so loved us, we also ought to love [not God, but] one another." Why so? Here, ver. 20 will guide us to an answer, if rightly used. Not, because we cannot love God whom we have not seen: but because the exponents of God, whom we have not seen, are our brethren, whom we do see. And the Apostle, in substituting "one another," does not for a moment drop or set aside the higher, "God," but in fact leads up to it, by putting its lower and visible objects before us. And then ver. 12 comes in as an explanation, an apology as it were, for this substitution, in the following manner: Love one another, I say: for the love to God, which is our duty, is love towards one whom we have never seen, and cannot exist in us [as ver. 20] unless by and with its lower degrees as manifested towards our brethren whom we have seen. By our love to them are we to know, how far we have love to Him: if that be present, He dwelleth in us, and "the love of Him is perfected in us." And thus [see below] the way is prepared for vv. 15, 16, which take up and bring to a conclusion the reasoning: if we love one another, God abideth in us (for the reason already stated in ver. 8, and restated in immediate connexion with this very matter in ver. 16, that God is Love, and every one that loveth is born of God, knows God, abides in God and God in him), and (simply the copula) the love of Him (as in ch. ii. 5, where we had the same expression, our love to Him, not, as some explain it, His love to us. This is evident, not merely from ii. 5, but from the context here: see it explained above, and remember that it is our love to God which is here the subject, as evinced by our love to our brethren. This is further shewn by the recurrence of the same expression in ver. 17, "Herein is love perfected with us," and ver. 18, "he that feareth is not made perfect in love." And so the majority of Commentators) is perfected (see note ch. ii. 5. Here, as there, it signifies, has reached its full maturity: the loving one another being the token and measure of it) in us (keep the primary and obvious sense, "in us," "within us," as in ch. ii. 5).

13.] In this we know that we are abiding in Him and He in us, because He hath given us of His Spirit (nearly repeated from ch. iii. 24. But why introduced here? In the former verse, the fact of His abiding in us was assured to us, if we love one another. Of this fact, when thus loving, we need a token. Him we cannot see: has He given us any testimony of His presence in us? He has given us such a testimony, in making us partakers of His Holy Spirit. This fact it is to which the Apostle here calls our attention, as proving not the external fact of the sending of the Son [ver. 14], but one within ourselves,—the indwelling of God in us, and our abiding in Him. It is obvious that all inferences from the expression "given us of His Spirit" against the personality of the Holy Ghost are quite beside the purpose: compare Acts ii. 17 with Joel iii. 1. We each have the indwelling of one and the same personal Spirit, but each according to our measure, 1 Cor. xii. 4, 11. One only had the Spirit without measure, in all His fullness: even Christ; John iii. 34. And the presence of the Holy Spirit is most aptly adduced here where love is in question, His first fruit being love, and His presence being tested by His fruits).

14, 15, 16.] The connexion seems to be this: the inward evidence of God's abiding in us and we in Him, is, the gift of His Spirit. But this is not the only evidence nor the only test which we have. This internal evidence is accompanied by, nay, is itself made possible [see ver. 19] by, our recognition of the Father's love in sending His Son as our Saviour: which last is a fact, testified by human evidence. This recognition of God's love is a condition of abiding in Him and He in us: in a word, is the abiding in love, which is equivalent to abiding in Him. And we (this we, emphatic, brings up in sharp relief the apostolic body, whom Christ appointed His witnesses, John xv. 27, Acts i. 8. The assertion is of the same kind as that in ch. i. 1) have beheld (with our eyes: the same word, and in the same sense, as in John i. 32) and do testify that the Father hath sent (do testify, not merely to the historical fact as a thing past, but to its abiding influence as implied by the words, "Saviour of the world" below: that the Father sent the Son, and that the Son is the Saviour of the world) the Son (better here than "His Son:" the Father and the Son are here used as theological terms) as Saviour of the world (the world here, as in ch. ii. 2, John iii. 16, in its widest sense: no evasion of this sense, such as the "elect in all nations," is to be endured). 15.] And recognition of this fact is a condition and proof of the life of God. Whosoever confesseth (the same remark holds good of this confessing, as before with regard to denying, ch. ii. 23: viz., that we must not bring into it more than the Apostle intends by it: it is not the "confession of the life" which is here spoken of, but that of the lips only. Of course it would be self-evident that this is taken by the Apostle as ruling the life; but simply as a matter of course. He speaks of the ideal realized) that Jesus is the Son of God (i. e. receives the testimony in the last verse as true), God abideth in him, and he in God. 16.] And we (not now the apostolic body only, but communicative; the Apostle and his readers. This is evident and necessary, because on the other view the words "in regard to us," which follow, interpreted as they must necessarily be of the same persons, would fit on awkwardly to the repeated general proposition with which the verse concludes) have known and have believed (the two roots which lie at the ground of confession, knowledge and faith, are in St. John's language most intimately connected. "True faith is, according to St. John, a faith of knowledge and experience: true knowledge is a knowledge of faith." Lücke. See John vi. 69) the love which God hath in regard to us (literally in us, in our case, as above, ver. 9: not "towards us," as Beza [and A. V.], Luther, &c.). b) God is Love, and he that abideth in love abideth in God and God [abideth] in him (this is the solemn and formal restatement of that which has been the ground-tone of the whole since ver. 7. And here, as there, love is in its widest abstract sense. Its two principal manifestations are, love to God, and love to one another: but this saying is of Love absolute).

17, 18.] These verses, which are parallel with ch. iii. 19—21, set forth the confidence with which perfect love shall endow the believer in the great day of judgment. Herein is love perfected with us (for the meaning of herein, see below. Love, not, as Luther and others, God's love to us: this is forbidden by the whole context: our verse is introduced by "he that abideth in love," and continued by "there is no fear in love:" it is love dwelling and advancing to perfection in us. And again, not love to God merely, nor love to our brethren merely; these are concrete manifestations of it: but love itself in the abstract—the principle of love, as throughout this passage. This sense of love will point out that of with us, which belongs not to the word love, but to the verb, as in ver. 12. Love is considered as planted in us; its degrees of increase take place with us—not merely "chez nous," in us, but as concerned with us; in a sense somewhat similar to that in "magnified His mercy with her," Luke i. 58.

See 2 John 2, where however the idea of dwelling with is more brought out than here), that we have confidence in the day of judgment (that gives not the purpose of the perfecting of love, but the explanation of "herein:" "in this love is perfected in us, viz. that we, &c.") The confidence which we shall have in that day, and which we have even now by anticipation of that day, is the perfection of our love; grounded on the consideration [because even as He is, &c.] which follows: casting out fear, which cannot consist with perfect love, ver. 18): because even as He (Christ, see below) is, we also are in this world (this is the reason or ground of our confidence: that we, as we now are in the world, are like Christ: and in the background lies the thought, He will not, in that day, condemn those who are like Himself. In these words, the sense must be gained by keeping strictly to the tenses and grammatical construction: not "as He was in the world," as some, changing the tense. And when we have adhered to tense and grammar, wherein is the likeness spoken of to be found? Clearly, by what has been above said, not in our trials and persecutions. Nor by our being not of the world as He is not of the world: nor in that we, as sons of adoption through Him, are beloved of God, even as He is beloved: nor, in that we live in Love, as He lives in Love: but in that we are righteous as He is righteous, ch. ii. 29, iii. 3 ff., 10, 22: this being evinced by our abiding in Love. St. John does not say that Love is perfected in confidence in us, because we resemble Christ in Love; but he refers to the fundamental truth on which our Love itself rests, and says; because we are absolutely like Christ, because we are in Christ Himself, because He lives in us, for without this there cannot be likeness to Him; in a word, because we are, in that communion with Christ which we are assured of by our likeness to Him in righteousness, children of God, therefore our love brings with it also full confidence. Essentially, the reason here rendered for our confidence in the day of judgment is the same as that given ch. iii. 21 f. for another kind of confidence, viz., that we keep His commandments. This also betokens the righteousness of which Christ is the essential exemplar, and which is a necessary attribute of those who through Christ are children of God).

18.] Confidence in (or as understood, as to) that terrible day presupposes the absence of fear: and this casting out of fear is the very work of love, which in its perfect state cannot coexist with fear.—

Fear (abstract and general) existeth not in love (abstract and general also, as in ver. 17: not “God’s love to us ;” nor “brotherly love”), may perfect (see on ver. 17) love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment (see below): but he that feareth hath not been perfected in [his] love. The points here to be noticed are,

1) the emphatic existeth not, which is better rendered as above, than “there is no fear in love,” in order to keep fear, which is the subject in the Greek, also the subject in the English:

2) may, or “but :” which is not here the mere adversative after a negative clause, in which case it would refer to something in which fear is, e. g. “fear existeth not in love, but existeth in hatred :” but it is the stronger adversative, implying “may far otherwise :” so far from it, that . . .

3) the argument, which is, a) that nothing having torment can consist with perfect love: b) that fear is in us by nature, and needs casting out in order to its absence.

4) the meaning of hath torment. Does torment mean merely pain, or pain as the result of punishment ? This last is certainly the sense, both from the usage of the word, and from the context, in which the day of judgment is before us. Fear, by anticipating punishment, has it even now; bears about a foretaste of it and so partakes of it.

5) the last clause, “he that feareth is not made perfect in love,” is intimately connected with what follows [see on ver. 14] as well as with what went before. The and [in the original, but : see rendering above] is adversative to the whole preceding sentence, and mainly to the idea of perfect love therein expressed.

As regards the absence of fear from the love of the Christian believer, it has been well observed by Ecumenius, that there are two kinds of godly fear, one which afflicts men with a sense of their evil deeds and dread of God’s anger, and which is not abiding: and the other, of which it is said, “The fear of the Lord is clean, and endureth for ever,” Ps. xix., and which is free from this kind of terror. And Bengel says in his brief pointed manner, “The condition of men is various: without fear and love alike: with fear and without love: with fear and love: without fear and with love.”

19.] I am sorry to be obliged here to differ from the best modern Commentators, and some of the older ones, in holding firmly that we love, indicative, is right, and not “let us love,” imperative [either of which would satisfy the original word]. This I do not merely on account of the expressed and emphatic we, though that would be a strong point in the absence of a stronger, but on account of the context, which appears to me to be broken by the imperative. He that feareth is not perfect in love. Our love [abstract, not specified whether to God or our brother] is brought about by, conditioned by, depends upon, His love to us first; it is only a sense of that which can bring about our love: and if so, then from the very nature of things it is void of terror, and full of confidence, as springing out of a sense of His love to us. Nor only so: our being new begotten in love is not only the effect of a sense of His past love, but is the effect of that love itself: We (emphatic—one side of the antithesis) love (most Commentators supply “Him” or “one another,” but unnecessarily. It is of all love that he is speaking; of love in its root and ideal), because He (God: see the parallel, ver. 10) first loved us (viz. in the sending of His Son).

20.] The connexion is most close: and the error great of those who have made a new section begin here. This love is universal, necessarily manifested in both of the two great departments of its exercise. Love, living and working in the heart as a principle, will fix first upon objects at hand and seen: those objects being natural objects for it to fix on. How then can a man love God, the highest object of love, who is removed from his sight, and at the same time refuse to love his brother, bearing the mark of a child of God, before his eyes from day to day? Put in a brief form, the argument, as connected with the last verse, is this: His love has begotten us anew in love: in this us are included our brethren, objects of our daily sight: if therefore we do not love them, we do not love Him. If any say ("have said;" i.e. at any time: the saying once, rather than the habit, is the hypothesis), I love God, and hate (present tense, of habit) his brother, he is a liar: for (here again the argument needs supplying from our common sense, which tells us that sight is an incentive towards love) he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen (perfect tense, implying,—and continues to feel the influence of that sight. We do not say "I have seen him" of the dead, but of the living only), cannot love God whom he hath not seen (St. John does not say that there is no love without sight; nor that we love all we see better than any thing we do not see: his argument rests on a deeper and truer position: viz. on that assumed in the term his brother, which carries with it the consideration that he of whom it is said is begotten of God. Both terms, his brother, and God, are used within the limits of the Christian life, of which that is true, which is unfolded ch. v. 1, that this brother, as begotten of God, is a necessary object of love to one that loves Him that begat him. Here, a lower step of the same argument is taken; but without this great truth, lying beneath the word brother, it would carry no conviction with it).

21.] And besides this argument from common sense, there is another most powerful one, which the Apostle here adds: "How lovest thou Him, whose commandment thou hatest?" as Augustine says. And this commandment we have from Him (God: not, Christ: see below), that he who loveth God, love also his brother (where have we this commandment? In the great summary of the law, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, . . . and thy neighbour as thyself," so often cited by our Lord: see Matt. xvii. 37—39).

CHAP. V. 1.] And who is our brother? and why does this name carry with it such an obligation to love? These questions, in closest connexion with the last verse, the Apostle answers in this. Every one that believeth that Jesus is the Christ hath been begotten of God (to whom do these words apply? from what follows, in which the verb hath been [or, is] begotten is taken up by him that is begotten, to the brother whom we are to love as a necessary accompaniment of our loving God. But most Commentators assume that it is of ourselves that this is said: our birth of God depends on and is in closest union with our faith, ch. iii. 23. Then the connexion between this and the following clause must be made by filling up an ellipsis, "and if begotten of God we love God." But this is far-fetched; and, as has been above shewn implicitly, alien from the context, the object of which is to point out who those are whom we are bound to love, if we love God. Then having made this predication one that loveth him that begat loveth him also that is begotten of him. <sup>2</sup> By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments. <sup>3</sup> For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous. <sup>4</sup> For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world: and this is the victory that over-of all the children of God, "every one that believeth, &c.," he, as so frequently, takes it up again below, ver. 4, with a more general reference, and dwells on our faith as the principle which overcomes the world: see there): and every one who loveth him that begat (these words take up again the former, "if any say, I love God," ch. iv. 20), loveth also him that is begotten of him (viz. the brother of whom the former clause spoke: not, as Augustine and others, Christ, the Son of God. As Calvin says, "Under this singular number he designates all the faithful. It is an argument drawn from the common order of nature").

2.] And indeed so inseparable are the two, that as before, iv. 20, our love to our brethren was made a sign and necessary condition of our love to God, so conversely, our love to God, ascertained by our keeping His commandments, is itself the measure of our love to the children of God. Either of the two being found to be present, the presence of the other follows. In this we know that we love the children of God (this, the children of God, takes up again, "him that is begotten of him" of the preceding verse), when (indefinite; "in every case where") we love God, and do His commandments (this adjunct is made, as the following verse shews, in order to introduce an equivalent to loving God, by which its presence may be judged).

3.] For (explaining the connexion of the two preceding clauses) the love of God is this (consists in this), that (explanatory: what he means by this) we keep His commandments. And His commandments are not grievous (the reason, why they are not grievous, is given in the next verse. Almost all the Commentators refer to Matt. xi. 36, "My yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

This declaration, that His commandments are not grievous, has, as did ch. iii. 9, furnished some of the Roman-Catholic Commentators with an opportunity of characterizing very severely the Protestant position, that none can keep God's commandments. But here, as there, the reply is obvious and easy. The course of the Apostle's argument here, as introduced in the next verse by because, substantiates this fact, that His commandments are not grievous, by shewing that all who are born of God are standing in and upon the victory which their faith has obtained over the world. In this victorious state, and in as far as they have advanced into it, in other words in proportion as the divine life is developed and dominant in them, do they find those commandments not grievous. If this state, in its ideality, were realized in them, there would be no difficulty for them in God's commandments: it is because, and in so far as, sin is still reigning in their mortal bodies, and their wills are unsubdued to God's will, that any grievousness, any burden, remains in keeping those commandments).

4.] because (reason, why His commandments are not grievous) all that is begotten of God (the neuter is here used as gathering together in one, under the category of "begotten of God," the "we" implied in the last verses) conquereth (of habit: simply predicated of the category, "all that is born of God") the world (the kingdom of evil under its prince the devil, God's adversary. The argument then is this: The commandments of God are not grievous: for, although in keeping them there is ever a conflict, yet that conflict issues in universal victory: the whole mass of the born of God conquer the world: therefore none of us need contemplate failure, or faint under his struggle as a hard one): and the victory which [hath] conquered the world is this, our faith (the identification of the victory with the faith which gained it, is a concise and emphatic way of linking the two inseparably together, so that wherever there is faith there is victory. And this is further expressed by the past tense here; by which it is signified that the victory is already won: see ch. ii. 13, iv. 4).

5.] If it be asked, How does our faith overcome the world? this verse furnishes the answer; because it brings us into union with Jesus Christ the Son of God, making us as He is, and partakers of His victory, John xvi. 33. Through this belief we are born again as sons of God; we have Him in us, One greater than he who is in the world, ch. iv. 4. And this conclusion is put in the form of a triumphant question: What other person can do it? Who that believes this, can fail to do it? Who is he that conquereth the world, except he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? By comparing ver. 1 a, we find 1) that "the Christ" there answers to "the Son of God" here; 2) that by the combination of the two verses, we get the proposition of ver. 4 a.

6—21.] THE THIRD AND LAST DIVISION OF THE EPISTLE. This portion falls naturally into two parts: vv. 6—13, and vv. 14—21: the former of which treats of the concluding part of the argument, and the latter forms the close of the Epistle.

6—13.] As in the former portions, our communion with God who is light [i. 5 ff.] was treated, and our birth in righteousness from God who is righteous [ii. 29 ff.], by faith in Jesus the Son of God,—so now we have another most important element of the Christian life set before us: the testimony to it arising from that life itself: the witness of the spiritual life to its own reality. This witness rests not on apostolic testimony alone, but on the Holy Spirit, which the believer has in himself [ver. 10], and which is God's testimony respecting His Son [vv. 9, 10], and our assurance that we have eternal life [ver. 13].

There is hardly a passage in the New

Test. which has given rise to more variety of interpretation: certainly none which [on account of the apparent importance of the words interpolated after ver. 7] has been the field of so much critical controversy. Complete accounts of both the exposition and the criticism will be found in the recent monographs on the Epistle: more especially in that of Düsterdieck.

6.] This (viz. the Person spoken of in the last verse; Jesus. This, which is maintained by most Commentators, is denied by Kuapp and Huther, who refer this to "the Son of God:" "The Son of God is he, &c.:" making the proposition assert the identity of the Son of God with the historical Jesus, not the converse. This Huther supports on two grounds: 1) that the fact that Jesus came by water and blood needed no proof even to Heretics: 2) that on the ordinary interpretation the following words, "Jesus Christ," become altogether superfluous. But to these it is easily replied, 1) that although the fact might be confessed, that was not confessed to which the fact bore testimony, viz. that Jesus who came in the flesh was the Son of God: 2) that the appositional clause, "Jesus Christ," is by no means superfluous, being only a solemn reassertion of our Lord's Person and Office as testified by these signs.

The main objection to Huther's view is, that, as well stated by Düsterdieck, it makes the coming by water and blood, which, by the context, is evidently in the Apostle's argument, a substantiating consideration, to be merely an exceptional one: "this Son of God is Jesus the Christ, though He came by water and blood." Therefore the other interpretation must stand fast) is he that came by water and blood (came refers not to the Lord's birth in the flesh, but to His open manifestation of himself before the world. See above, on ch. iv. 2.

The preposition by, which passes into "in" in the next sentence, is thereby explained to bear its very usual sense of through or by means of, as said of that which accompanies, as the medium through which, or the element in which. The very same phrases, "by blood," and "in blood,"

*Christ: not by water only but by water and blood.
And it is the Spirit that* are used of our Lord in Heb. ix. 12, 25, which chapter is the best of all comments on this difficult expression.

by water and blood has been very variously understood. Two canons of interpretation have been laid down by Düsterdieck, and may safely be adopted: 1) "Water" and "blood" must point both to some purely historical facts in the life of our Lord on earth, and to some still present witnesses for Christ: and 2) they must not be interpreted symbolically, but understood of something so real and powerful, as that by them God's testimony is given to believers, and eternal life assured to them. These canons at once exclude all figurative interpretations, such as that of Socinus and his school, in which water stands for the purity and innocence of the life and doctrine of Christ, Heb. x. 22, Eph. v. 26, — and blood for the death of Christ as His testimony of Himself.

Düsterdieck observes that it is remarkable that the best Roman-Catholic expositor, Estius [whose commentary is unfortunately broken off at this verse], does not, as some have done, interpret blood of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, but puts together water and blood, as Calvin and Luther. So that, as Düsterdieck proceeds to say, the great leaders of the three schools of theology have had the tact to see that which their less skilled followers have missed seeing,—that blood cannot by any means be understood of the Lord's Supper, as has been done by many.

The next point which comes before us is to enquire whether at all, or how far, our passage is connected with John xix. 34? It occurs here, because many Commentators have seen in the incident there related a miraculous symbolizing of the two sacraments, and in this passage an allusion to that incident. To deny all such allusion seems against probability. The Apostle could hardly both here and in that place lay such evident stress on the water and blood together, without having in his mind some link connecting this place and that. The idea that we have here nothing more than a reference to the fact of John xix. 34, is against our 2nd canon above: but that John xix. 34 and this refer to the same fundamental truth, is I conceive hardly to be doubted.

It rests now then that we enquire into the meaning of each expression. On the first, blood, there cannot surely be much uncertainty. The blood of His Cross must, by all Scripture analogy, be that intended. The pouring out of this blood was the completion of the baptism which He had to be baptized with, Mark x. 28, 29, Luke xii. 50. And if this is so, to what can the term water be referred so simply, as to that baptism with water, which inaugurated the Lord's ministry? It might indeed be said, that the baptism which He instituted for His followers, better satisfies the test of our 2nd canon, that viz. of being an abiding testimony in the Christian Church. But to this there lies the objection, that as blood signifies something which happened to Christ Himself, so must water likewise, at least primarily, whatever permanent testimony such event may have left in the Christian Church. And thus some modern Commentators have taken it; as uniting the historical fact of the Lord's baptism with the ordinance of baptism, grounded on it, and abiding in the Christian Church. Düsterdieck refuses to accept this view, denying that our Lord's baptism was any proof or testimony of His Messiahship, and understanding water of the ordinance of baptism only. But surely we are not right in interpreting the words "He that came by water," He that ordained baptism: nor in giving the two, blood and water, an entirely different reference. For his endeavour to escape from this by making the former represent not Christ's death but His blood, applied to us, cannot be accepted, as giving a "non-natural" sense to the words "he that came by blood" likewise.

All this being considered, it seems impossible to avoid giving both to blood and water the combined senses above indicated, and believing that such were before the Apostle's mind. They represent,—the water, the baptism of water which the Lord Himself underwent and instituted for His followers,—the blood, the baptism of blood which He Himself underwent, and instituted for His followers. And it is equally impossible to sever from these words the historical accompaniments and associations which arise on their mention.

AUTHORIZED VERSION REVISED.

Spirit is that which beareth witness, because the Spirit is the truth.

† For they that bear witness † are †

† The words in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth, are omitted by all Greek MSS. (till the 10th century); all the Greek Fathers; all the ancient versions; and most of the Latin Fathers. See note.

The Lord's baptism, of itself, was indeed rather a result than a proof of His Messiahship: but in it, taking St. John's account only, a testimony to His divine Sonship was given, by which the Baptist knew Him to be the Son of God: "I have seen, and have borne witness, that this is the Son of God," are his words, John i. 34; and when that blood was poured from His "riven side," he that saw it again uses the same formula, "he that hath seen it hath borne witness." It cannot be that the word witness being thus referred to two definite points of our Lord's life, should not apply to these two, connected as they are with water and blood here mentioned, and associated by St. John himself with the remarkable word hath borne witness (ver. 9) in the perfect tense, of an abiding witness in both cases.

But these past facts in the Lord's life are this abiding testimony to us, by virtue of the permanent application to us of their cleansing and atoning power. And thus both our canons are satisfied, which certainly is not the case in Düsterdieck's interpretation, though they were laid down by himself), Jesus Christ (see above on this). In all the places where St. John uses this Name, it has a solemn meaning, and is by the emphasis thus thrown on the official designation of our Lord, nearly equivalent to "Jesus the Christ." Compare John i. 17, xvii. 3: 1 John i. 3, 7, ii. 1, iii. 23, iv. 2, v. 20: 2 John 3, 7; not in the water only, but in the water and in the blood (in, see above on by). The sense of the two is there shewn to be closely allied, in giving rather the "element in which," by, the medium through which. The definite article before each word shews that they are well-known and solemn ideas. It is inserted not as matter of course, but as giving solemnity.

But why has the Apostle added this sentence? It has been thought that it is to give Christ the preference over Moses, who came only by water (1 Cor. x. 2), and Aaron, who came only by blood (of sacrifice), whereas Christ united both. But this is too far-fetched. Another opinion again regards the words as directed against those who despised the Cross of Christ (1 Cor. i. 23): but a more definite explanation than this is required. And those can hardly be wrong, who find it in such words as those of the Baptist in John i. 25, "I baptize with (in) water, but there standeth one among you whom ye know not;" compare the emphatic repetitions below, ver. 31, "I came baptizing with (in) water;" and ver. 33, "He that sent me to baptize with (in) water." The baptism of Jesus was not one of water only, but one of blood,—"behold the Lamb of God"—and something more than that which follows in the next clause); and the Spirit is that which witnesseth, because the Spirit is the truth (that is, as explained by the next verse, the Spirit is an additional witness, besides those already mentioned to the Messiahship of Jesus, and in that, to the eternal life which God has given us in Him. Some have thought that because should be "that;" the same Greek word signifying both these. But it is not to the fact that the Spirit is the truth, that the Spirit gives witness: but it is the fact that He is the truth, which makes Him so weighty a witness; which makes the giving of witness so especially His office.

Very various however have been the meanings here given to the Spirit. One view understands, the spirit of our Lord, which He when dying commended into His Father's hands. Another, explaining water and blood of the two Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, sees in the Spirit, in connexion with John xx. 22 ff., a third Sacrament of absolution. Others regard it as equivalent to the spiritual man, i.e. St. John himself. Others again regard it as equivalent to God—and the occasion of the testimony to be the Resurrection, when our Lord rose with Divine power. The Socinian Commentators interpret it of the divine power by which Christ wrought His miracles. But this, as well as Bede's interpretation, that the Spirit which descended on the Lord at His baptism is meant, inasmuch as it testified to His being the true Son of God, fails, in giving no present abiding testimony such as the context requires. Others again understand by it the ministry of the word.

AUTHORIZED VERSION.

record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost : and these three are one. <sup>8</sup> And there

Most of these understand the Spirit here and in ver. 8 differently. But nothing can be plainer than that we must not alter the meaning, where the word for binds together the sentences so closely.

The above interpretations failing to give any satisfactory account of the text, we recur to the simple and obvious meaning, the Holy Spirit. And it seems fully to satisfy all the requirements of the passage. The Holy Spirit is He, who testifies of Christ [John xv. 26], who glorifies Him, and shews of the things which belong to Him [John xvi. 14]. It is by the possession of Him that we know that we have Christ [ch. iii. 24]. And the following clause, "because the Spirit is the Truth," exactly agrees with this. He is the absolute truth [John xiv. 17, xv. 26], leading into all the truth [John xvi. 13 f.]. And in this consists the all-importance and the infallibility of His witness). 7.] "John here renders a reason why he spoke not of the Spirit only, who has the chief authority in this matter, but also of the water and the blood, because in them also there is no small credit due to testimony, and the ternary number is in case of witnesses the most complete." Grotius. For (that this, and not "because," is the correct English reading, see my Greek Test.) those who bear witness are three (the three are considered as living and speaking witnesses; hence we have the masculine form in the original. By being three, they fulfil the requirements of the Law as to full testimony: Dent. xvii. 6, xix. 15: Matt. xviii. 16, 2 Cor. xiii. 1), the Spirit, and the water, and the blood (now, the Spirit is put first: and not without reason. The Spirit is, of the three, the only living and active witness, properly speaking: besides, the water and the blood are no witnesses without Him, whereas He is independent of them, testifying both in them and out of them), and the three concur in one (contribute to one and the same result: viz. the truth that Jesus is the Christ, and that we have life in Him. And this their one testimony is given by the purification in the water of baptism into His name, John iii. 5: by the continual cleansing from all sin which we enjoy in and by His atoning blood: by the inward witness of His Spirit, which He hath given us).

The question of the genuineness of the words read in the received text at the end of ver. 7 is discussed, as far as external grounds are concerned, in the Digest in my Greek Test.; and it may there be seen, that unless pure caprice is to be followed in the criticism of the sacred text, there is not the shadow of a reason for supposing them genuine. Even the supposed citations of them in early Latin Fathers have now, on closer examination, disappeared.—Something remains to be said on internal grounds, on which we have full right to enter, now that the other is secured. And on these grounds it must appear, on any fair and unprejudiced consideration, that the words are 1) alien from the context: 2) in themselves incoherent, and betraying another hand than the Apostle's. For 1) the context, as above explained, is employed in setting forth the reality of the substance of the faith which overcomes the world, even of our eternal life in Jesus the Son of God. And this is shewn by a threefold testimony, subsisting in the revelation of the Lord Himself, and subsisting in us His people. And this testimony is the water of baptism, the blood of atonement, the Spirit of truth, concurrent in their witness to the one fact that He is the Son of God, and that we have eternal life in Him. Now between two steps of this argument,—not as a mere analogy referred to at its conclusion,—insert the words "for there are three that bear witness in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit: and these three are one," and who can fail to see, unless prejudice have blinded his eyes, that the context is disturbed by the introduction of an irrelevant matter? Consequently, Bengel, one of the most strenuous upholders of the words, is obliged tamely to take refuge in the transposition of vv. 7 and 8 (which was perhaps the original form of its insertion in the vulgate), so as to bring into treatment the matter in hand, before the illustration of it is introduced. But even suppose this could be done; what kind of illustration is it? What is it to which our attention is directed? Apparently the mere fact of the triplicity of testimony: for there is not the remotest analogy between the terms in the one case and those in the other: the very order of them, differing as it does in the two cases, shews this. Is this triplicity a fact worthy of such a comparison? And then, what is the testimony in heaven? Is it borne to men? Certainly not: for God hath no man seen, as He is there: His only-begotten Son hath declared Him to us on earth, where all testimony affecting us must be borne. Is it a testimony to angels? Possibly: but what has this to do with the matter in hand? And then, again, what but an unworthy play on words can it be called, to adduce the fact of oneness on the one side, the essential unity of the ever blessed Godhead, and on the other the concurrence in testifying to one fact,—as correspondent to one another? Does not this betray itself as the fancy of a patristic gloss, in the days when such analogies and comparisons were the sport of every theological writer? And 2) the very words betray themselves. “The Father” and “the Word” are never combined by St. John, but always the Father and the Son. The very apology of Bengel, “the appellative, the Word, is most appropriate to testimony,” may serve to shew how utterly weak he must have felt the cause to be.

The best conclusion to the whole subject is found in the remark of Bengel himself on another occasion of the practice reprobated, of which he himself furnishes here so striking an instance: “They exhibit a mischievous zeal in the Lord’s quarrels, who bring themselves to reason thus, ‘This text is convenient for my doctrine and argument; therefore I will constrain myself to believe it genuine, and will obstinately defend it, and all that can be scraped together on its behalf.’ But the Truth needs not false supports, resting much better on itself alone.” As the results of critical enquiry now stand, we may safely affirm, that no reasonable man, acquainted with the facts, can again defend the genuineness of these words. If any do defend them, it is the charitable conclusion that he speaks in ignorance. The real mischief is, that the ignorant in high places allow themselves to use the strong language of authority, and thus become the chief enemies of truth. A sketch of the principal particulars of the dispute and of the books relating to it is given in Horne’s Introduction, vol. iv. pp. 355—388.

9.] An argument from the less to the greater, grounded on the practice of mankind, by which it is shewn that God’s testimony must be by all means believed by us. If we (mankind in general; all reasonable men) receive (as we do: receive with approval; accept) the testimony of men (generic; the testimony, i. e. in any given case. No special testimony need be thought of, as touching this present case: the proposition is general), the testimony of God is greater (supply in the argument, “and therefore much more ought we to receive that.” The testimony of God here spoken of is not any particular testimony, as the prophecies concerning Christ, or the testimony of the Baptist and other eye-witnesses to Him, or the Prophets, the Baptist, Martyrs, and Apostles: it is general, as is the testimony of men with which it is compared. The particular testimony pointed at by the general proposition is introduced in the following words: for (see above at the beginning of ver. 7. Here there is an ellipsis: “and this maxim applies in the case before us, because”) the testimony of God is this, that He hath borne testimony concerning His Son (i. e. the testimony of God to which the argument applies is this, the fact that He hath borne testimony to His Son).

10—12.] The perfect tense, “hath borne witness,” in ver. 9, shewed that the testimony spoken of is not merely an historical one, such for instance as Matt. iii.

17, which God bore witness to, but one abiding and present. And these verses explain to us what that testimony is. He that believeth in the Son of God hath the testimony (just spoken of; the testimony of God) in him (i. e. in himself. The two readings do not differ in sense. The object of the divine testimony being, to produce faith in Christ, the Apostle takes him in whom it has wrought this its effect, one who habitually believes in the Son of God, and says of such an one that he possesses the testimony in himself. What it is, he does not plainly say till below, ver. 11. But easily enough here we can synthetically put together and conjecture of what testimony it is that he is speaking: the Spirit by whom we are born again to eternal Life, the water of baptism by which the new birth is brought to pass in us by the power of the Holy Ghost [John iii. 5, Titus iii. 5], the Blood of Jesus by which we have reconciliation with God, and purification from our sins [ch. i. 7, ii. 2], and eternal life [John vi. 53 ff.],—these three all contribute to and make up our faith in Christ, and so compose that testimony, which the Apostle designates in ver. 11 by the shorter term which comprehends them all): he that believeth not God (St. John, as so frequently, proceeds to put his proposition in the strongest light by bringing out the opposite to it. The believing simply is wholly different from "believing on" above. That is the resting trust of faith: this the mere first step of giving credit to a witness. And thus it is tacitly assumed that one who does not believe in the Son of God, gives no credit to God Himself) hath made Him a liar (perfect tense, because the state of discredit implies a definite rejection still continuing. On the expression, see ch. i. 10), because he hath not believed in (here, not only, hath not credited, though that was the more shameful rejection of God's word: but now the full rejection—the refusal to believe in, cast himself on God's testimony) the testimony which God hath testified concerning His Son.

11.] Wherein this testimony consists. And the testimony (just spoken of) is this, that (consists in this, namely, that . . .) God gave (not, as A. V., "hath given." This is of especial importance here, where not the endurance of a state, but the fact of the gift having been once made, is brought out. The present assurance of our possessing this gift follows in the next clause, and in ver. 12) to us (not decreed, or promised, but gave, absolutely) eternal life, and (this clause does not depend on "this is the witness, that . . ." but ranges with that clause: "this is the witness, &c. ; and this life is, &c.") this life is in His Son (is in Him essentially [John i. 4, xi. 25, xiv. 6], bodily [Col. ii. 9], energetically [2 Tim. i. 10]. Here again, as ever in this Epistle, we have to guard against the evasive and rationalistic interpretations of the Socinians, that "the reason of our getting eternal life from God is found in Jesus Himself" [so Socinus]: that in is put for "by," and is for "happens" [so Grotius]).

12.] Conclusion of the whole argument from ver. 6: dependent on the last clause of ver. 11, and carrying it on a step further, even to the absolute identity as matter of possession for the believer, of the Son of God, and eternal life. He that hath the Son, hath the life: he that hath not the Son of God, the life hath he not. First notice the diction and arrangement, on which Bengel has well remarked, "The verse has two members: in the former of God' is not added, for the faithful know the Son: in the other, it is added, that unbelievers may know how great a thing they lose."

Next, the having the Son must not be explained away, with Grotius, by "keeping the words which the Father committed to the Son," nor having life, with the same, by "having a certain right to eternal life." The having the Son is the possession of Christ by faith, testified by the Spirit, the water, and the blood: and the having the life is the actually possessing it, not indeed in its most glorious development, but in all its reality and vitality.

Thirdly, it must be remarked that the question as to whether eternal salvation is altogether confined to those who in the fullest sense have the Son [to the exclusion, e. g., of those who have never heard of Him], does not belong here, but must be entertained on other grounds. See note on 1 Pet. iii. 19.

<sup>13.</sup>] This verse seems, as John xx. 30 f., like an anticipatory close of the Epistle: and its terms appear to correspond to those used in ch. i. 4. This view is far more probable, than that it should refer only to what has occurred since ver. 6, as ch. ii. 26 to ver. 18 ff. there: or only to vv. 11, 12. Still less likely is it that the concluding portion of the Epistle begins with this verse, as some have thought. These things wrote I to you that ye may know that ye have eternal life, [to you] that believe in the name of the Son of God (the two readings come, in the sense, to much the same. If that in the A. V. be followed, then the words "that ye may believe" must be interpreted "that ye may continue to believe").

14—21.] CLOSE OF THE EPISTLE. The link which binds this passage to ver. 13 is the word confidence, taken up again from the knowledge spoken of in that verse. This confidence is the very energizing of our spiritual life: and its most notable and ordinary exercise is in communion with God in prayer, for ourselves or for our brethren, vv. 14—17. Then vv. 18—20 continue the explanation of the "sin unto death" and the "sin not unto death," by setting forth the state of believers as contrasted with that of the world, and the truth of our eternal life as consisting in this. Then with a pregnant caution, ver. 21, the Apostle closes his Epistle.

14, 15.] The believer's confidence as shewn in prayer. And the confidence which we have towards Him (which follows as a matter of immediate inference from the fact of our spiritual life: see ch. iii. 19—21) is this, that if we ask any thing according to His will, He heareth us (this confidence may be shewn in various ways, including prayer as one, ch. iii. 22. And that one, of prayer, is alone chosen to be insisted on here.

Him and His will must by all analogy be referred to the Father, not to the Son, by whom we have access to the Father. See especially ch. iii. 21, 22. The truth that God hears all our prayers, has been explained on ch. iii. 22. The condition here attached, that the request be according to His will, is in fact no limitation within the reality of the Christian life, i. e. in St. John's way of speaking according to the true ideal. For God's will is that to which our glorious Head himself submitted himself, and which rules the whole course of the Christian life for our good and His glory: and he who in prayer or otherwise tends against God's will is thereby, and in so far, transgressing the bounds of his life in God: see James iv. 3. By the continual feeling of submission to His will, joined with continual increase in knowledge of that will, our prayers will be both chastened, and directed aright. If we knew His will thoroughly, and submitted to it heartily, it would be impossible for us to ask any thing, for the spirit or for the body, which He should not hear and perform. And it is this ideal state, as always, which the Apostle has in

All these we have: not one of them is lost: He has heard, He has answered them all: we know that we have them in the truest sense, in possession).

16, 17.] Join together the confidence concerning prayer just expressed, and the all-essential Christian principle of brotherly love, and we have following as matter of course, the duty, and the practice, of intercession for an erring brother. And of this, with a certain not strictly defined limitation, these verses treat. If any man see (on any occasion: "shall have seen") his brother (as throughout the Epistle, to be taken in the stricter sense: not any neighbour, but his Christian brother, one born of God as he is himself) sinning (this present participle is not merely predicative, but graphic, as describing the 'brother' actually in the act and under the bondage of the sin in question) a sin not unto death (see below), he shall ask (the future conveys not merely a permission to ask, "it shall be lawful for him to ask,"—but a command, taking for granted the thing enjoined as that which is to happen), and shall give him life (viz. the asker shall give: not, as many have understood it, God shall give him life, though of course this is so in reality: but the words mean, he, interceding for his brother, shall be the means of bestowing life on him.

This bestowal of life by intercessory prayer, is not to be minutely enquired into, whether it is to be accompanied with fraternal rebuke,—whether it consists in the giving to the sinner a repentant heart, but taken as put by the Apostle, in all its simplicity and breadth. Life, viz. the restoration of that divine life from which by any act of sin he was indeed in peril and indeed in process of falling, but his sin was not an actual fall) for them that sin not unto death (the clause takes up and emphatically repeats the hypothesis before made, viz., that the sin of the brother is not unto death. It does so in the plural, because the him before being indefinite, all such cases are now collected in a class: "shall give this life, I repeat, to those who sin not unto death"). There is a sin unto death: concerning it I do not say that he should make request (leaving for the present the great question, I will touch the minor points in this verse. First, it necessarily by the conditions of the context involves what is equivalent to a prohibition. This has been denied by many Commentators. "Ask if thou wilt, but in uncertainty of obtaining," says Cornelius-a-lapide. And it is equally denied, without the same implied meaning being given, by many others: some of these, as Neander, thinking it implied, that prayer may be made, though the obtaining of it will be difficult,—others, as De Wette, that it will be in vain, others, as Luther, that St. John simply says such a case was not within his view in making the above command. And most of even those who have recognized the prohibition, strive to soften it, saying, as e.g. Lyra, that though "we are not to pray for the condemned," yet we may pray for such a sinner, "that he may sin less, and so be less condemned in hell:" or as Bengel, "God willeth not that the godly should pray in vain, Deut. iii. 26. If therefore one who has committed mortal sin is brought back to life, it is from the mere divine purpose, reserved from us." Calvin indeed holds fast the prohibition in all its strictness, but only in extreme cases : adding, "But, seeing that this happens more rarely, and God, commending the immense riches of His grace, commands us to be merciful after His example : we must not hastily pass upon any man the judgment of eternal death, but rather charity should induce us to hope well of him. But if the desperate impiety of some looks to us hardly short of a pointing it out by the finger of the Lord God, it is not for us to contend with the just judgment of God, or desire to be more merciful than He is."

Certainly this seems, reserving the question as to the nature of the sin, the right view of the words, I say not. By an express command in the other case, and then as express an exclusion of this case from that command, nothing short of an implied prohibition can be conveyed.

The second point here relates to the difference between ask and make request. The Greek word represented by the former is more of the petition of the inferior, as of the conquered, or of the guilty : that represented by the latter is more general, of the request of the equal, or of one who has a right. Our Lord never uses the former of His own requests to God, but always the latter. And this difference is of importance here. The asking for a sin not unto death is a humble and trusting petition in the direction of God's will, and prompted by brotherly love : the other, the making request for a sin unto death, would be, it is implied, an act savouring of presumption—a prescribing to God, in a matter which lies out of the bounds of our brotherly yearning [for notice, the hypothesis that a man sees a brother sin a sin unto death is not adduced in words, because such a sinner would not truly be a brother, but thereby demonstrated never to have deserved that name : see ch. ii. 19], how He shall inflict and withhold His righteous judgments.

And these latter considerations bring us close to the question as to the nature of the sin unto death. It would be impossible to enumerate or even classify the opinions which have been given on the subject. Düsterdieck has devoted many pages to such a classification and discussion. I can do no more than point out the canons of interpretation, and some of the principal divergencies. But before doing so, ver. 17 must come under consideration).

17.] All unrighteousness is sin (in the words all unrighteousness we have a reminiscence of ch. i. 9, "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," and also, but not so directly, of ch. iii. 4, which is virtually the converse proposition to this. Here the Apostle seems to say, in explanation of what he has just written, "SIN is a large word, comprehending all unrighteousness whatever : whether of God's children, or of aliens from Him." The thoughts which have been brought into these words,—that unrighteousness is a mild word, meant to express that every slight trip of the good Christian falls under the category of sin, and so there may be a sin not unto death,—or, on the other hand, that it is a strong word, as Grotius says, "he calls unrighteousness not every ignorance or sudden fall into sin, but sin committed either with deliberation, or with space given for deliberation,"—or thirdly, as Beza, that "all sins are so far equal, that even the least thought of the least sin deserves eternal death a thousand times over," and "that all sins are of themselves deadly,"—are equally far from the meaning of the words, whose import is, as above, to account for there being a sin not unto death as well as a sin unto death); and there is a sin not unto death (not having death for its issue : within the limit of that unrighteousness, from all of which God cleanseth all those who confess their sins, ch. i. 9).

Our first canon of interpretation of the sin unto death and the sin not unto death is this : that the death and the life of the passage must correspond. The former cannot be bodily death, while the latter is eternal and spiritual life. This clears away at once all those Commentators who understand the sin unto death to be one for which bodily death is the punishment, either by human law generally, or by sickness inflicted by God; or of which there will be no end till the death of the sinner, which Bede thinks possible, and

Lyra adopts. This last is evidently absurd, for how is a man to know whether this will be so or not?

Our second canon will be, that this sin unto death being thus a sin leading to eternal death, being no further explained to the readers here, must be presumed as meant to be understood by what the Evangelist has elsewhere laid down concerning the possession of life and death. Now we have from him a definition immediately preceding this, in ver. 12. "He that hath the Son hath life: he that hath not the Son of God, the life hath he not." And we may safely say that the words unto death here are to be understood as meaning, "involving the loss of this life which men have only by union with the Son of God." And this meaning they must have, not by implication only, which would be the case if any obstinate and determined sin were meant, which would be a sign of the fact of severance from the life which is in Christ [see ch. iii. 14, 15, where the inference is of this kind], but directly and essentially, i. e. in respect of that very sin which is pointed at by them. Now against this canon are all those interpretations, far too numerous to mention, which make any atrocious and obstinate sin to be that intended. It is obvious that our limits are thus confined to abnegation of Christ, not as inferred by its fruits otherwise shewn, but as the act of sin itself. And so, with various shades of difference as to the putting forth in detail, most of the best Commentators both ancient and modern.

Our third canon will help us to decide, within the above limits, what especial sin is intended. And it is, that by the very analogy of the context, it must be not a state of sin, but an appreciable act of sin, seeing that that which is opposed to it in the same kind, as being not unto death, is described by "if any man see his brother sinning, &c." So that all interpretations which make it to be a state of apostacy, do not reach the matter of detail which is before the Apostle's mind.

In enquiring what this is, we must be guided by the analogy of what St. John says elsewhere. Our state being that of life in Jesus Christ, there are those who have gone out from us, not being of us, ch. ii. 19, who are called "antichrists," who not only "have not" Christ, but are Christ's enemies, denying the Father and the Son [ii. 22], whom we are not even to receive into our houses nor to greet [2 John 10, 11]. These seem to be the persons pointed at here, and this the sin: viz. the denial that Jesus is the Christ, the incarnate Son of God. This alone of all sins bears upon it the stamp of severance from Him who is the Life itself. As the confession of Christ, with the mouth and in the heart, is salvation unto life [Rom. x. 9], so denial of Christ with the mouth and in the heart, is sin unto death. This alone of all the proposed solutions seems to satisfy all the canons above laid down. For in it, the life cast away and the death incurred strictly correspond: it strictly corresponds to what St. John has elsewhere said concerning life and death, and derives its explanation from those other passages, especially from the foregoing ver. 12: and it is an appreciable act of sin, one against which the readers have been before repeatedly cautioned [ch. ii. 18 ff., iv. 1 ff., v. 5, 11, 12]. And further, it is in exact accordance with other passages of Scripture which seem to point at a sin similarly distinguished above others: viz. Matt. xii. 31 ff., and, so far as the circumstances there dealt with allow common ground, with the more ethical passages, Heb. vi. 4 ff., x. 25 ff. In the former case, the Scribes and Pharisees were resisting the Holy Ghost [Acts vii. 51], who was manifesting God in the flesh in the Person and work of Christ. For them the Lord Himself does not pray (Luke xxiii. 34): they knew what they did: they went out from God's people and were not of them: receiving and repudiating the testimony of the Holy Ghost to the Messiahship of Jesus.

18—20.] Three solemn maxims of the Epistle regarding sin and the children of God and the world, and our eternal life in Christ, are repeated as a close of the teaching of the Apostle. Ver. 18 seems to be not without reference to what has just been said concerning sin. In actual life, even our brethren, even we ourselves, born of God, shall sin, not unto death, and require brotherly intercession: but in the depth and truth of the Christian life, sin is altogether absent. It is the world, not knowing God, which lies under the power of the wicked one: God's new-begotten children he cannot touch: they are in and they know the True One, and in Him have eternal life. These maxims are introduced with a thrice-repeated we know, the expression of full persuasion and free confidence. They form a triumphant repetition of and anticipation of the attainment of the purpose expressed in ver. 13, "that ye may know that ye have eternal life."

18.] We know that every one who is born of God, sinneth not (see on ch. iii. 9, from which place our words are almost repeated. As explained there and in our summary of these verses, there is no real inconsistency with what has been just said. And that there is none, the second member of the verse shews): but he that hath been born of God (literally, he that was born of God. The perfect tense expresses more the enduring abidance of his heavenly birth, and fits better the habitual meaning of the words sinneth not: the mere past tense calling attention to the historical fact of his having been born of God, fits better the fact that the wicked one toucheth him not, that divine birth having severed his connexion with the prince of this world and of evil), it keepeth him ("it," viz. the divine birth, pointed at in the words born of God). It is this, and not the fact of his own watchfulness, which preserves him from the touch of the wicked one: as in ch. iii. 9, where the same is imported by "his seed abideth in him." The rationalistic Commentators insist on the reading, "he keepeth himself," as shewing, as Socinus, "that he himself does and contributes something:" and the orthodox Commentators have but a lame apology to offer. Düsterdieck compares "purifieth himself," ch. iii. 3. But the reference there is wholly different—viz. to a gradual and earnest striving after an ideal model; whereas here the keeping must be, by the very nature of the case, so far complete, that the wicked one cannot approach: and whose self-guarding can ensure this even for a day? Compare John xvii. 15, "that thou shouldest keep them from the evil," which is decisive), and the wicked one (Satan) doth not touch him (of course the words must not be understood as saying that he is not tried with temptation by the evil one: but imply that, as the Prince of this world had nothing in our blessed Lord, even so on His faithful ones who live by His life, the Tempter has no point d'appui, by virtue of that their birth, by which they are as He is. "The malignant one approaches them," says Bengel, "as a fly the candle,"—but hurts them not, nor even touches them").

19.] Application of that which is said ver. 18, to the Apostle and his readers: and that, in entire separation from the wicked one, the ruling spirit of this present world. We know (see summary above) that we (not emphatic. It is not the object now to bring out a contrast, but to reassert solemnly these great axioms of the Christian life) are of God (i. e. born of God: identifying us with those spoken of ver. 18), and the whole world lieth in the wicked one (this second member of the sentence does not depend on the preceding that, but like those of vv. 18, 20, is an independent proposition. the wicked one, not "wickedness," as A. V.: the neuter sense can hardly stand after ch. ii. 13, 14, iii. 8, 10, 14 compared: iv. 4: John xvii. 14 f., and above all after the preceding verse here. In this unusual term, lieth in, the idea in the power of, and the local idea, seem to be combined. The wicked one is as it were the inclusive abiding-place and representative of all his, as, in the expressions "in the Lord," "in Christ," "in Christ Jesus," "we are in the true One," ver. 20, the Lord is of His. And while we are from God, implying a birth and a proceeding forth and a change of state, the world, all the rest of mankind, lieth in the wicked one, remains where it was, in, and in the power of, the wicked one. Some Commentators have been anxious to avoid inconsistency with such passages as ch. ii. 2, iv. 14, and would therefore give the world a different meaning here. But there is no inconsistency whatever. Had not Christ become a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, were He not the Saviour of the whole world, none could ever come out of the world and believe on Him; but as it is, they who do believe on Him, come out and are separated from the world: so that our proposition here remains strictly true: the world is the negation of faith in Him, and as such lies in the wicked one, His adversary.)

20.] Yet another we know: and that in general, as summing up all, the certainty to us of the Son of God having come, and having given us the knowledge of God, and of our being in Him: and the formal inclusion, in this one fact, of knowledge of the true God here, and life everlasting hereafter. Moreover (closes off and sums up all. This not being seen, it has been altered to "and," as there appeared to be no contrast with the preceding) we know that the Son of God is come (the incarnation, and work, and abiding presence, of the Son of God, is to us a living fact. HE IS HERE—all is full of Him—"the Master is come, and calleth for thee"), and hath given (it is the Son of God who is to us the bestower of this knowledge, see ver. 13: it is He who is here at the end of the Epistle made prominent, as it is He who is to us eternal life, and he who hath Him hath the Father) to us [an] understanding (by understanding is meant the divinely empowered inner sense by which we judge of things divine. It is not the wisdom or judgment itself, but the faculty capable of attaining to it. Compare John i. 12, 18, xvii. 2 f., 6 f., 25 f. 2 Cor. iv. 6, Eph. i. 18., that we know (that we know must bear a sort of pregnant sense, of a purpose accomplished or at least secured) the true One (i. e. God: compare John xvii. 3, "that they may know Thee the only true God." The adjective true is not subjective, but objective, in the sense of genuine, in distinction from every fictitious god. And thus the way is prepared for the warning against all false gods, ver. 21); and we are (again, as in vv. 18, 19, this second member is an independent proposition, not dependent on the "that") in (see above, on "lieth in," ver. 19) the true One (viz. God, as above), in

His Son Jesus Christ (i. e. by virtue of our being in His Son Jesus Christ: this second in is not in apposition with, but explanatory of the former). This (viz. God the Father: the true One, who has been twice spoken of: see below) is the true God, and eternal life. There has been great controversy, carried on principally from doctrinal interests, respecting the reference of the word this: whether it is to be understood as above, or of His Son Jesus Christ, just mentioned. The Fathers who were engaged against Arian error, and most of the orthodox expositors since, regarding the passage as a precious testimony for the Godhead of the Son, have maintained this latter view, rather doctrinally than exegetically. One of the principal Socinianizing expositors, even Episcopius, takes this view, not being able to bear the caprice and tortuousness of the Socinian exegesis. The opposite doctrinal interest has led many of those who deny this application. To these have succeeded another set of expositors with whom not doctrinal but exegetical considerations have been paramount.

The grounds on which the application to Christ is rested are mainly the following: 1) that the pronoun this most naturally refers to the last-mentioned substantive: 2) that eternal life, as a predicate, more naturally belongs to the Son than to the Father: 3) that the sentence, if understood of God the Father, would be aimless, and tautological. But to these it has been well and decisively answered by Lücke and Düsterdieck, 1) that "this" more than once in St. John belongs not to the nearest substantive, but to the principal one in the foregoing sentence, e. g. in ch. ii. 22 and in 2 John 7: and that the subject of the whole here has been the Father, who is the true One of the last verse, and the Son is referred back to Him as "His Son," thereby keeping Him, as the primary subject, before the mind. 2) that as little can "eternal life" be an actual predicate of Christ as of the Father. He is indeed "the life," ch. i. 2, but not "eternal life."

Such an expression used predicatively, leads us to look for some expression of our Lord's, or for some meaning which does not appear on the surface to guide us. And such an expression leading to such a meaning we have in John xvii. 3, "This is eternal life, that they may know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou didst send." He is eternal life in Himself, as being the fount and origin of it: He is it to us, seeing that to know Him is to possess it. I own I cannot see, after this saying of our Lord with the words, Thee the only true God, how any one can imagine that the same Apostle can have had in these words any other reference than that which is given in those. 3) this charge is altogether inaccurate. As referred to the Father, there is in it no tautology and no aimlessness. It serves to identify the "true One" mentioned before, in a solemn manner, and leads on to the concluding warning against false gods. As in another place the Apostle intensifies the non-possession of the Son by including in it the alienation from the Father also, so here at the close of all, the true God, the fount of eternal life, is put before us as the ultimate aim and end, to be approached in His Son, but Himself the one Father both of Him and of us who live through Him.

21.] Parting warning against idols. Little children (he parts from them with his warmest and most affectionate word of address), keep yourselves from idols (or more literally, from the idols, viz. which are about you. The idol is properly a figure of an imaginary deity,—while an image, or likeness, is that of some real person or thing made into an object of worship. See Rom. i. 23, 1 Cor. x. 19, xii. 2, and especially 1 Thess. i. 9, where, as here, "the living and true God" is opposed to idols. And there seems no justification for the departing from the plain literal sense in this place. All around the Christian Church was heathenism: the born of God, and they that were lying in the wicked one, were the only two classes: those who went out of one, went into the other: God's children are thus then finally warned of the consequence of letting go the only true God, in whom they can only abide by abiding in His Son Jesus Christ, in these solemn terms,—to leave on their minds a wholesome terror of any the least deviation from the truth of God, seeing into what relapse it would plunge them).

4.—11.] Truth and love: These (see ver. 1) were the two ground-tones of the Epistle. And now the Apostle proceeds to describe his joy at finding the children of the elect lady walking in truth (ver. 4), and to enforce the commandment, to love one another (5, 6): and this in presence of the fact that many deceivers are in the world, who would rob us of our Christian reward, and of our share in God (7—9). These are not to be treated as brethren, nor greeted, lest we partake of their evil deeds (10, 11).

4.] I rejoiced greatly (at some definite time perhaps: but it may also be the epistolary form of putting the verb, implying the present only: and this is made more probable by the perfect tense, “I have found,” which follows. See however 3 John 3), that I have found (the most obvious interpretation is, that at some place where the Apostle was, he came upon these who are presently mentioned: as in Acts xviii. 2, Paul came to Corinth: and finding a certain Jew, &c.) of thy children (some) walking in truth (i.e. not only in honesty and uprightness, but in that truth which is derived from and is part of the truth of God in Christ: see above on 1.—Again, there is no hint whatever given that the rest, or that others, of her children were not walking in truth. The Apostle apparently, as above, in some place where he was, lit upon these children of the “lady,” and sends her their good report. Respecting the rest, he makes no mention nor insinuation), according as we received commandment from the Father (viz. to walk in the truth: not, as Lücke, to love one another, making this clause a further description of the manner in which they were walking in truth). 5.]

And now (so coupling to what has gone before, 1 John ii. 28. It has also a force of breaking off, and passing to that which is the main subject, or most in the Writer's thoughts, which here is, that this walking in truth is a walking after God's commandments in love) I entreat thee (see on entreating and asking, 1 John v. 15, 16. Here the entreating carries a mild admonition with it, and assumes that the writer had a right thus to entreat), lady, not as writing to thee a new commandment, but (as writing to thee) that which we had from the beginning (see on this, 1 John ii. 7, 8), that (i.e. in order that: not merely explanatory here) we love one another (the expression of the commandment in the first person is a mark of gentleness and delicacy: a sign that he who wrote it kept the commandment himself).

6.] And (the onward course of thought here is highly characteristic of St. John) this is love (love is used in its widest sense, as the sum and substance of all God's commandments: not only as love to God; nor only as love to the brethren), that (the explicative “that”

of St. John) we walk according to His commandments. The commandment (the one commandment in which God's other commandments are summed up) is this, even as ye heard from the beginning that ye should walk in it ("Is this, even that which ye heard from the beginning, that ye should walk in it," viz. in love.

from the beginning, as above, ver. 5, and 1 John ii. 7). 7, 8.] The condition of Love is Truth, see ver. 3. And the necessity of fresh exhortation to walk in love, in that love whose condition is truth, lies in the fact that there are many deceivers gone forth, denying the Truth: of whom we are to beware, and not, by extending to them a spurious sympathy, to become partakers with them. 7.]

Because many deceivers (makers to wander) went forth (here probably, on account of the past tense, "from us," as in 1 John ii. 19. In 1 John iv. 1, it is perfect, "are gone forth," where I have preferred the sense, "are gone forth from him who sent them," viz. the evil one. Huther prefers this latter sense here also) into the world, [namely] they who confess not (instead of "not confessing," the Apostle writes they who confess not, thereby not merely characterizing the deceivers as not confessing, &c., but absolutely identifying all who repudiate the confession which follows, as belonging to the class of deceivers) Jesus Christ coming in [the] flesh (coming, altogether timeless, and representing the great truth of the Incarnation itself, as distinguished from its historical manifestation [1 John v. 6], and from the abiding effect of that historical manifestation [1 John iv. 2]. He who denies the coming in the flesh, denies possibility of the Incarnation: he who denies the having come, denies its actuality). This (viz. "he that fulfils the above character") is the deceiver and the antichrist (see notes on 1 John ii. 18, 22, as to the personal relation of these "many" to the one great Antichrist of prophecy. The word this, pointing to a class, makes each one of these, in his place, a representative and "precursor of Antichrist").

8.] The warning is suddenly introduced without any coupling particle, and becomes thereby so much the more solemn and forcible. Look to yourselves (yourselves here probably implies not as Bengel, during my absence, but "yourselves," as contrasted with the deceivers, that ye too become not as they), that ye lose not the things which ye wrought (the reading of this is somewhat uncertain. We had better give the explanation of all three forms. 1) "that ye lose not the things which we wrought," i.e. that ye, Christian converts, lose not that your Christian state of truth and love which we, Apostles and Teachers, wrought in you. The Apostles were God's workmen, Matt. ix. 37; 2 Tim. ii. 15: the false apostles were crafty workmen, 2 Cor. xi. 13; bad workmen, Phil. iii. 2: the true work was to cause men to believe on Christ, John vi. 29: and this work the false teachers put in peril of loss. If 2) the whole be in the first person, "that we lose not the things which we wrought," then the apostolic reward, the souls which are to be their hire, must be understood: if 3) in the second,—"that ye lose not the things which ye wrought,"—no human merit, but the reward laid up for faithfulness, and for every thing done in His name, must be understood, which is reckoned of grace, and not of debt), but receive reward in full (the connexion of work with reward must not be broken. The idea is a complex one. Ye, our converts, are our reward in the day of the Lord: and this has suggested the use of the well-known word, even where it manifestly applies not to the teachers but to the taught, whose reward is the eternal life, which shall receive on that day its glorious completion: which is having the Son and the Father: see 1 John iii. 2.—If readings 1) or 2) be right, the use which Roman-Catholic expositors have tried to make of this verse to establish the merit of human works falls at once to the ground. Nor indeed does it fare much better if the other reading be taken).

9.] Explanation of this loss, that it is the non-possession of God, which is incurred by all who abide not in Christ's teaching. Every one that goeth before [you] (such I believe to be the meaning of the somewhat difficult word here used: every one who would set up for a teacher, going before the sheep, as John x. 4, and they following. The expositors who take this reading interpret it, "goeth forward too fast," "maketh false and unsound advance," regarding it, either as ironical [so Luther], or as serious [so Dinterdieck]), and not abiding in the doctrine of Christ (i. e. in Christ's doctrine,—that truth which Christ Himself taught. This is far more likely than that of Christ should be objective, as Bengel ["in doctrine which teaches that Jesus is the Son of God"], and others: and thus we have the personal genitive after doctrine wherever it occurs in the New Test.: see Matt. vii. 28; Mark iv. 1; John xviii. 19; Acts ii. 42), hath not God (see 1 John ii. 23, v. 12, notes): he that abideth in the doctrine, that man hath both the Father and the Son (see as above. The order is the theological one, the Father being mentioned first, then the Son).

10, 11.] The exercise of the love of brethren is conditioned and limited by the truth: and is not to be extended to those who are enemies and impugnors of the truth. Those who harbour or encourage such, make common cause with them, and their evil deeds.

10.] If any cometh unto you, and bringeth not (the indicative mood, "cometh," "bringeth," shows that the case supposed actually existed: that such persons were sure to come to them: compare, in the revised text, John xi. 12; 2 Cor. ii. 5; 1 John iv. 11. It is not the same as if with a subjunctive mood, "if any come, and bring," which always carries a purely hypothetical force, corresponding to an interrogation, whereas the other corresponds to an assertion) this doctrine (the expression, "bringeth not this doctrine," points out the person as a teacher, not a mere traveller seeking hospitality. The original implies that he not only comes without this doctrine, but by so doing, brings the contrary doctrine. The absence of testimony for the truth is, in one who brings any testimony at all, equivalent to testifying for error), receive him not into [your] house, and do not bid him good speed: 11.] for he that biddeth him good speed partaketh in his evil deeds (these words must be understood with their right reference: "not of men who have never had any relation with the church, —1 Cor. v. 10,—but of men who wish to be thought brethren, and overthrow the truth," as Grotius says. These were not to be received with the hospitality with which all Christian brethren were to be entertained. Such reception of them would in fact be only opening an inlet for their influence. But this is not the point on which the Apostle mainly dwells. It is the participation which the host in such a case would incur with them and their antichristian designs, by encouraging them. And this is further impressed by the caution against saying good speed to them: which is a further intensification of the exclusion from the house, and forms a climax,—do not even by wishing him good speed, which, if spoken by a Christian, would mean God speed,—identify yourselves with his course and fortunes. If you do, you pronounce approval of his evil deeds, and so far share his guilt, advancing their success by your wishes for it.

This command has been by some laid to the fiery and zealous spirit of St. John, and it has been said that a true Christian spirit of love teaches us otherwise. But as rightly understood, we see that this is not so. Nor are we at liberty to set aside direct ethical injunctions of the Lord's Apostles in this manner. Varieties of individual character may play on the surface of their writings: but in these solemn commands which come up from the depths, we must recognize the power of that One Spirit of Truth which moved them all as one. It would have been better for the Church now, if this command had been observed in all ages by her faithful sons).

12, 13.] CONCLUSION. Having many things to write unto you, I would not [communicate them] by means of paper and ink (paper, says Lücke, the Egyptian papyrus, probably the so-called Augustan or Claudian,—ink, that made of soot and water thickened with gum, — pen [see 3 John 13], the writing-reed, probably split, —were the New Testament writing materials): but I hope to come to you, and to speak mouth to mouth (so “face to face,” 1 Cor. xiii. 12), that your joy may be filled full (see 1 John i. 4: viz. by hearing from the mouth of the Apostle himself those messages of life and truth which he forbore writing now: not merely, as some think, by his bodily presence only: still less, because the Apostles were unwilling to commit all their teaching to writing, but reserved many things to oral teaching only, as some Roman-Catholic Commentators, than which it is hardly possible to imagine a sillier comment: for the First Epistle was written with this very same view, ch. i. 4). There greet thee the children of thine elect sister (these words are variously interpreted according as the kyria is understood of a lady, or of a church. The non-mention of the kyria herself here seems, it must be confessed, rather to favour the latter hypothesis. See on the whole, the Introduction).

1.] ADDRESS. The elder (see Introduction to the two Epistles) to Caius the beloved (on Caius, see Introduction. The epithet beloved seems to be used this first time in a general sense,—beloved by all: see below), whom I (for my own part: Caius was generally beloved, and the Apostle declares that he personally joins in the affection for him) love in [the] truth (see 2 John 1, note). 2—4.]

Wish that Caius may prosper as his soul prospers: and ground of this latter assertion.—Beloved (the repetition of the word is due perhaps more to the fact that the direct address begins here, than to any specific motive, such as the supposed ill health of Caius), I pray that concerning all things (not, as A. V., “above all things”) thou mayest prosper and be in health (i. e. bodily health), even as thy soul prospereth (as is shewn by what follows. There is a passage in Philo, in which the well-being of body and soul are similarly compared: that of the body referring to health and strength, that of the soul to the enjoyment of virtue).

3.] For I rejoiced greatly, when the brethren came and testified to thy truth (thy share of that Truth in which thou walkest, see below), even as (almost equivalent to how that, see below) thou walkest in truth (this clause is not an independent one, adding the testimony of the Apostle to that of the brethren,—“as [I know that] thou walkest, &c.,” but is explanatory of the former clause, and states the substance of the testimony of the brethren, as is shewn by what follows).

4.] Explains I rejoiced greatly above. I have no greater joy than this (literally, “than these things”), that I hear of my children walking in the truth (the expression children here seems rather to favour the idea that the “Kyria” of the 2nd Epistle is a Church: see Introduction to 2 John).

Beloved (beginning again of new address: see above on ver. 2), thou doest a faithful act (one worthy of a "faithful" man) whatsoever thou workest towards (so the Lord in Matt. xxvi. 10 describes His anointing by Mary thus, "She hath done a good work towards Me") the brethren, and that (and those brethren), strangers (love of strangers is an especial mark of Christian love, Rom. xii. 13, 1 Tim. iii. 2, Tit. i. 8, Heb. xiii. 2, 1 Pet. iv. 9), 6.] who (the above-named strange brethren) bore testimony to thy love in the presence of the church (viz. where St. John was at the time of writing. They were Evangelists, ver. 7: and thus would naturally give the church an account of their missionary journey, during which they were so hospitably treated by Caius): whom thou wilt do well if thou forward on their way worthily of God (in a manner worthy of Him whose messengers they are and whose servant thou art): for on behalf of the Name (of Christ: see Acts. v. 41; ix. 16; xv. 28) they went forth (on their missionary journey), taking nothing (receiving nothing by way of benefaction or hire: even as St. Paul in Achaia, 1 Cor. ix. 18; 2 Cor. xi. 7 ff., xii. 16 ff.; 1 Thess. ii. 9 ff.: against Huther, who denies the applicability of the comparison, seeing that in St. Paul's case they were Christian churches: but so must these have been, before they would contribute to the support of their missionaries. The peculiar word used for nothing implies that it was their own deliberate purpose; refusing to take any thing) from the Heathens. We therefore (contrast to the heathens: therefore, because they take nothing from the heathens) ought to support (the word does not seem to signify "receive hospitably," as some have explained it) such persons, that we may become fellow-workers [with them] for the truth.

9, 10.] Notice of the hostility of Diotrephes. I wrote somewhat to the church (the word somewhat does not imply that the thing written was specially important, nor on the other hand does it depreciate; but merely designates indefinitely: compare Acts xxiii. 17; Luke vii. 40; Matt. xx. 20. The contents of the Epistle are not hinted at. The church is apparently the church of which Caius was a member: not, as Bengel, that out of which the missionaries of ver. 7 had gone forth): howbeit Diotrephes, who loveth preeminence (he appears to have been an ambitious man, who willed that not the Apostle but himself should rule the church) over them (the members of the church, implied in the word previously used), receiveth us not (does not recognize our authority: here in an improper sense, but in the next verse probably literal: see there. We wants no explanation, such as our commands, our Epistles, or the like: in rejecting the Apostle's person, he rejected all his influence). On this account, if I should come, I will bring to mind (i.e. as Bede, to the knowledge of all, by plainly stating them) his works which he doeth (what they were, is explained by the participle following), prating against us (this is the best rendering, which conveys not only that he used reproaches, but also that the reproaches were mere tattle, worth nothing, irrelevant. See 1 Tim. v. 13) with wicked speeches: and not satisfied with this (his conduct and words), neither doth he himself receive the brethren (here receive seems best taken in its literal sense, of entertaining hospitably, see 2 John 10. The brethren are probably the same as in ver. 5, the travelling missionaries), and hinders (by forbidding: see 1 Thess. ii. 16) those that would (receive them), and casts them (those that would receive the brethren: not, the travelling brethren themselves) out of the church (manifestly, by excommunication, which owing to his influence among them he had the power to inflict. There is no difficulty, nor any occasion to take the word as pointing at that which Diotrephes was attempting to do or threatening to do, and so as spoken in irony: the present tense indicates his habit, as above. He was evidently one in high power, and able to forbid, and to punish, the reception of the travelling brethren. See Introduction). <sup>11.</sup> Upon occasion of the hostility just mentioned, St. John exhorts Caius to imitate not the evil but the good,—probably as shewn in the praises of Demetrius which follow. Beloved, imitate not evil (abstract), but good (abstract also). He that doeth good is from God (is born of God, and has his mission and power from Him; as so often in the first Epistle): he that doeth evil hath not seen God (see reff.). <sup>12.]</sup> The praise of Demetrius. Testimony hath been borne to Demetrius by all (namely, who know him, and have brought report concerning him), and by the truth itself (it is not very easy to explain this expression. We may understand it that the reality of facts themselves supports the testimony of all. But there are two reasons against this view: 1) that it does not correspond to the objective fact asserted in the statement, nor to the parallelizing of this testimony with that of all and that of the Apostle: and 2) that thus the Christian and divine sense of the truth, which St. John seems always to put forward, would be entirely sunk. Some would understand that Demetrius had done much for the truth, and his deeds were his witness: but this is hardly a witness of the truth to him. Others take refuge in the extraordinary supposition, that the Holy Spirit had revealed to the Apostle the truth respecting Demetrius. Hather regards the testimony borne by the truth to be that furnished by all, whose evidence was decisive, not from their credit as men, but because they all spoke of and from the truth of Christ dwelling in them. This would reduce this new testimony to the former, and would in fact besides include the following in it likewise. The best interpretation is that of Düsterdieck. The objective Truth of God, which is the divine rule of the walk of all believers, gives a good testimony to him who really walks in the truth. This witness lies in the accordance of his walk with the requirement of God's Truth. It was the mirror in which the walk of Demetrius was reflected: and his form, thus seen in the mirror of God's Truth, in which the perfect form of Christ is held up to us [1 John ii. 6, iii. 3, 16], appeared in the likeness of Christ; so that the mirror itself seemed to place in a clear light his Christian virtue and uprightness, and thus to bear witness to him): yea, we too (besides the two testimonies foregoing) bear testimony; and thou knowest that our testimony is true.

Remember our Lord's legacy, John xiv. 27, and His greeting after the Resurrection, John xx. 19. 26). The friends salute thee. Salute the friends by name (as if I had written their names here). The reason why St. John mentions friends [see John xi. 11, xv. 15, Acts xxvii. 3], and not brethren [1 Cor. xvi. 20, Phil. iv. 21, Eph. vi. 23], is probably to be found in the personal character of the Epistle, not addressed as from an Apostle to a church, but as from a friend to his friend, in which mutual friends on both sides would be the senders and receivers of salutation.

It became more frequently used, as might be expected, in the later days of the canon), and kept for Jesus Christ (reserved, to be His at the day of His coming. If the question be asked, kept by whom? the answer must be, by God the Father: though constructionally the words are not connected. The participles are perfect, giving the signification “from of old and still”): Mercy to you, and peace, and love, be multiplied (all three proceeding from God: God’s mercy, God’s peace, God’s love: see ver. 21. In the somewhat similar passage, Eph. vi. 23, the love and faith are clearly, in themselves, the gift of God: mutual love, or love towards God. But the other seems better here).

(this may mean, concerning the fact of our common salvation, brought in by Christ; or concerning the means of attaining that salvation, i. e. the doctrines and practices by which it is to be forwarded. Perhaps the latter is here preferable. On the idea conveyed by common, see Tit. i. 4, and 2 Pet. i. 1), I found it necessary (not, as A. V. "it was needful:" the necessity was not part of the giving diligence, but supervened on it, owing to the circumstance to be mentioned in the next verse) to write to you, exhorting [you] to contend earnestly for the faith (objective here: the sum of that which Christians believe: faith which is believed, not faith by which we believe) once for all ("an urgent fact;—no other faith will ever be given." Bengel. This is obscured by the "once" of the A. V., which represents merely its having been given, not its having been the only gift of the kind) delivered to the saints (i. e. Christians: believers.—The meaning then of this verse is, that St. Jude, who was before earnestly desirous to write to the Church universal concerning the salvation which is common to us all [De Wette, after Sherlock, supposes that St. Jude was actually engaged on a larger and more general Epistle, and was compelled to break it off by the necessity mentioned. This may have been so: but we can hardly gather so much from the words], found urgent occasion at once to do so, respecting not merely nor directly that common salvation, but one point, viz. the keeping inviolate the faith once for all delivered to God's people. And the reason of this necessity which arose, now follows).

4.] For there crept in (not "are . . . crept in:" the past tense explains the arising of the occasion of his thus writing. On crept in, see 2 Pet. ii. 1, and note: also Gal. ii. 4. Secrecy, and lack of legitimate introduction, are plainly expressed in the word. "Crept in," viz. into the Christian church) of old certain men (it has been observed that the term certain men has a tinge of contempt about it), [men] who have been of old written down in prophecy (to what time and fact are we to refer such designation of them? Clearly not to God's eternal purpose, in this place, from the term of old, which, as Huther remarks, is never used of that purpose, but points to some fact in time. And if so, then the previous writing down of these men can only point to the Old Test. prophecies. What special description of them is intended, might be difficult to say were it not for the quotation below, ver. 17, from the prophecy of Enoch. The warnings contained in the historical facts adduced below may also be meant. It may be observed that the ultra-predestinarians, Beza and Calvin, find, as we might expect, strong defence for their views in their interpretation here. Beza indeed gathers from this place, "that this eternal decree of God comprehended not only the event, but even principally, the persons themselves involved in it") to this judgment (what judgment, or rather result of judgment? that presently to be mentioned: the sentence which St. Jude has in his mind, and proceeds in the following verses to unfold. Judgment, as so often, though not the same as condemnation, yet gets the condemnatory meaning from the character of the context), impious, changing the grace of our God (i. e. the gift of grace, the state of salvation, in which our sins are forgiven us and we are admitted into the freedom of God's children. Of our God; drawing closer the bond of God's true children to Him and one another, and thus producing greater abhorrence of those who have thus abused His grace) into lasciviousness (the words might mean, "perverting the grace of our God in the direction of, for the purposes of lasciviousness:" but the meaning of the verb used is simply to change, not to pervert: and we therefore must understand, as above, that they made the state of grace and Christian liberty into a state of [moral] licence and wantonness), and denying (see 2 Pet. ii. 1) the only Master, and our Lord Jesus Christ (in 2 Pet. ii. 1 Master is used of Christ: which circumstance might tempt us to refer it to Christ here also. But probability seems to weigh on the other side. In every other place [Luke ii. 29, Acts iv. 24, Rev. vi. 10, Jer. iv. 10 in the Septuagint translation] Master is used of God: 2) the addition "only" seems to bind this meaning to it here: 3) the denial of God by disobeying His law is the explanatory resumption of the last clause: 4) Master and Lord are hardly distinguishable, if both applied to Christ).

5.] First example: unbelieving Israel in the wilderness. See Heb. iii. 16—iv. 5. But (solemn contrast to the conduct just mentioned) I wish to remind you, knowing as ye do (better here than "although ye know," on account of the term "once for all" which follows. The A. V. is altogether wrong) once for all (i. e. having once for all received the knowledge of) all things (all that refers to that of which I am speaking: the clause carries with it a latent admonition, to apply other examples for yourselves), that Jesus (critical principles seem to require this remarkable reading. It is not entirely preceded by 1 Cor. x. 4: for there St. Paul uses not the personal human name, but "Christ," in which there is no such difficulty. The only account to be given seems, that, the Person designated by the two names being the same, they became sometimes convertibly used in popular exhortation), having saved the people (on the fact, see Exod. xiv. 19, xxxiii. 20, 23, xxxii. 2, Isa. lxiii. 9, in which last place however the Septuagint version has "Out of all their affliction not an ambassador, nor yet an angel, but he himself named them") out of the land of Egypt, secondly (not as A. V., "afterward," but it indicates a second deed of the Lord, His first-mentioned having been the deliverance out of Egypt) destroyed them that believed not (viz. by forbidding their entrance into the land of promise [see Heb. iii. 18], and slaying them in the wilderness. This example is not mentioned in 2 Pet. ii., but instead of it, the judgment of the flood).

6.] Second example: the rebel angels. See 2 Pet. ii. 4. And (the connexion with the foregoing is very close) angels, those which kept not (angels is probably indefinite, and then what follows designates those angels who are meant) their own dignity (some interpret as A. V., "first estate," "original condition;" some again, "the government which was over them," viz. that of God. But seeing that angels are often in the New Test. called "governments," or "powers," as they also were among the Jews, and that such meaning answers best to the parallel clause which follows, there can be little doubt that the rendering government, or principality, or dignity, is right. The fact alluded to is probably that which is obscurely indicated in Gen. vi. 2. See Introduction), but left their own [proper] habitation (viz. heaven), He hath kept (in sharp contrast to "which kept not") against the judgment of the great day (at the end of the world) in eternal bonds under darkness (the darkness being considered as brooding over them, and they under it. There is apparently a difference, which we cannot explain, between the description of the rebel angels here and in the parallel place, 2 Pet. ii. 4, and that in the rest of the New Test., where the devil and his angels are said to be powers of the air, and to go about tempting men. But perhaps we are wrong in absolutely identifying the evil spirits mentioned here with those spoken of in 2 Peter).

7.] Third example: Sodom and Gomorrah. See 2 Pet. ii. 6. How (not "even as," as A. V.) Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them, following fornication in like manner to these (i. e. to the angels above mentioned. The manner was similar, because the angels committed fornication with another race than themselves, thus also going away after strange flesh), and going away after (it was a departure from the appointed course of nature, and seeking after that which was unnatural) other flesh (than that appointed by God for the fulfilment of natural desire. The sin of Sodom was afterwards common in the most enlightened nations of antiquity: see Rom. i. 27. But in all probability Sodom and Gomorrah must be numbered among those whose sin went further even than this: compare Lev. xviii. 22—25. See 2 Pet. ii. 10), are set forth as an example, undergoing (to this day, present participle; alluding to the natural phenomena of the Dead Sea) the just punishment of eternal fire (the sense is, undergoing the punishment, as may even now be seen, of eternal fire: of that fire which shall never be quenched).

8 ff.] Designation of these evil men as following the same destructive courses. In like manner nevertheless (i. e. notwithstanding these warning examples) these men in their dreams (the term represents that state of dreaming in the sleep of sin, out of which men are so often called on to awake to righteousness and the light of Christ: so Arnaud, "cependant ceux-ci, comme des gens qui agissent sans savoir ce qu'ils font, comme s'ils rêvaient, pour ainsi dire . . .") defile the flesh (by unnatural lusts, as in verse 7, the flesh, generally: not, 'their flesh,' but our common flesh), and despise lordship, and speak evil of glories (of what sort? Some understand those of kings and Cæsars: others include ecclesiastical rulers and Apostles. But to neither of these meanings can verses 9, 10 be fitted: and it becomes therefore necessary to understand the words of celestial lordships and dignities: probably in both cases those of the holy angels).

9.] But Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed concerning the body of Moses, dared not (by the context, from reverence for Satan's former glory) bring against him a judgment of evil speaking (i. e. as

A. V. a railing accusation: a sentence savouring of, belonging to, evil speaking), but said, The Lord rebuke thee (the source of the tradition to which St. Jude here refers as familiar to his readers, is not known with any certainty. Origen says, "In the Ascension of Moses, of which book the Apostle Jude makes mention in his Epistle, Michael the archangel, disputing with the devil concerning the body of Moses, says . . ." No such tradition is found in any apocryphal or rabbinical book now extant. In the targum of Jonathan on Deut. xxxiv. 6, it is stated that the grave of Moses was given into the special custody of Michael. Some have given an allegorical interpretation, understanding by the body of Moses the law, or Jewish polity, or even people: and, thus interpreting, fix the occasion very variously: at the giving of the law: at the siege under Hezekiah, or the rebuilding under Zerubbabel. All such explanations are of course out of the question: and the literal matter of fact alone to be held fast. It is, however, remarkable, that the same words, The Lord rebuke thee, are spoken by the angel to the devil in Zech. iii. 1—3. This has led some, e. g. Bede, to imagine, that this was the occasion referred to, when Joshua and Satan stood as adversaries concerning the deliverance of Israel from captivity. The only straightforward conclusion is, that St. Jude took the incident from primitive tradition, which tradition, slightly modified, is also given by the prophet Zechariah. That the incident is related as matter of fact, and not as an "argumentum ad hominem," is evident by the very form of it. That, being thus related as matter of fact, it is matter of fact, is a conclusion which will or will not be made, according as we are or are not persuaded of the authenticity of our Epistle as a part of canonical Scripture: and according as we esteem that canonical Scripture itself).

10.] Contrast of the behaviour of these persons to that just related. 2 Pet. ii. 12. These on the other hand, whatever things they know not, speak evil of (the reference in whatever things they know not is to the spiritual world. Those who understand dominion and glories above of human authorities, are at a loss for an explanation here: so Arnaud, "il est assez difficile de préciser, quelles étaient ces choses qu'ignoraient cesi mpies"): but whatever things naturally, as the irrational animals, they understand (viz. the objects of sense: of which the flesh, ver. 8, has already been mentioned as one. naturally, i. e. instinctively. In 2 Pet. ii. 12, the comparison to irrational creatures is not confined to the sort of knowledge which they have, but is extended to the persons themselves and their conduct), in these (in the element and region of these) they corrupt themselves (or, are depraved).

11.] The description is interrupted by a denunciation on them for having followed in the steps of former ungodly men. Woe unto them (so also St. Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 16, "woe is unto me?" from which it appears that Bengel is not exact, when he says "that this apostle only, and in this place only, uses the imprecation"): for they went by the way (the past tenses are probably anticipatory, as looking back on their course: as those in John xvii.,—"I glorified Thee on the earth, &c.") In an English version we are sometimes [though not here] compelled to render these by our perfect, "they have gone," &c.) of Cain (how? I have treated some of the explanations in my Greek Test. The most probable answer is that given by Stier and Luther, that the point of comparison is that selfish regard and envy which was at the root of Cain's sin), and rushed after (so literally) the

they like Korah despised God’s ordinances.
Gainsaying, because Korah and his com-

12, 13.] Continuation of the description of these ungodly men. 2 Pet. ii. 13, 17.—
These are rocks [which are] in your love-feasts (the Greek word [spiladēs] is interpreted to mean rocks under water.
They were the rocks on which the love-feasts [agapæ] stood in danger of being wrecked. It is unnecessary and unjustifiable to attempt to give the word any other meaning, as some have done on account of the “spots” [spiloi] in 2 Pet. ii. 13.
But each passage must stand on its own ground, feasting with you (it may mean, feasting together: but the other is more probable) fearlessly (without any fear of the consequences for themselves; or, as some take it, for you), pasturing their own selves (using the love-feasts not for their legitimate purpose, the realization of the unity of Christians by social union, but for their own purposes, the enjoyment of their lusts, and the furtherance of their schemes. See Ezek. xxxiv. 1; the parallelism of which has however been too far pressed here by Grotius and Bengel, “feeding themselves, not the flock:”
which thought does not seem to be in the context, but merely that they feed and pasture themselves in the love-feasts, having no regard to the Shepherd [or shepherds] set over them): clouds without water (see on “wells without water” in 2 Pet. ii. 17. Water is expected from clouds), carried out of course by winds (here our text is the more concise: St.

Peter having, as above, the “wells without water” separate from the “clouds carried by a storm.” Prov. xxv. 14. carried away, borne by, or as above, borne out of their course, hither and thither), autumn trees (i.e. as trees are in the late autumn: without fruit explaining it, see below: “trees as in late autumn, without fruit or leaves.” It does not mean that their fruit is withered, as Beza [and consequently A. V.], without fruit (as trees at the time above mentioned; but there is nothing in this word to indicate whether fruit has been on them or not), twice dead (it is not easy to explain these words in reference to trees. For that we must do so, and not desert the similitude, and understand it of spiritual death twice inflicted, or of death here and in eternity, must be evident by “plucked up by the roots” following. The most likely reference of the word is to the double death in a tree, which is not only as it seems to the eye in common with other trees, in the apparent death of winter, but really dead: dead to appearance, and dead in reality), rooted out (the various descriptive clauses form a climax: not only without leaves and fruit, but dead: not only dead, but plucked up and thrown aside. “Tous ces mots sont des métaphores énergiques pour montrer le néant de ces impures, la légèreté de leur conduite, la stérilité de leur foi et l’absence

The similitude would not find any propriety as applied to the planets, properly so called: for there can be no allusion to the astronomical fact of their being naturally opaque bodies, as Bengel imagines. Many Commentators have supposed that the similitude is to be understood of teachers, who would enlighten others, and yet are doomed to darkness themselves: so (Eccumenius, comparing the transformation into an angel of light, 2 Cor. xi. 14. But the context does not justify this. Rather should we say, these professing Christians, by their profession lights in the world, instead of letting that light shine on more and more into the perfect day, are drifting about in strange errors of doctrine and practice till it will be utterly extinguished in eternal darkness).

14, 15.] Prophecy of Enoch respecting them:—see below.—Yea, and of these prophesied Enoch, seventh from Adam ("mentioned to commend the antiquity of the prophecy," Calvin. Possibly also the fact of seven being the sacred number may have been in view, as Bengel: "The word is not without mystery, seeing that immunity from death and the sacred number concur." Several similar designations are quoted: e.g. Philo alleges Moses to have been the seventh generation from Abraham. A rabbinical writer on Numb. xxv. 12, says, "Phineas was the seventh progeny from Jacob our father"), saying, Behold, the Lord ("the name Jehovah [of which the Lord is the rendering] was already known in the time of Enoch," Bengel) came (the historic tense of prophecy) among (in, as surrounded by) His holy myriads (of angels: see Deut. xxxiii. 2; Zech. xiv. 5, Heb. xii. 22), to execute judgment upon all, and to convict all the impious concerning all their works of impiety which they impiously did, and concerning all the hard things which impious sinners spoke against Him.—I have discussed in the Introduction the question as to the source of this citation, and its relation to the present apocryphal book of Enoch. I will only here set down the passage as it at present stands in De Saey's version: "And He came with ten thousands of His holy ones, to hold judgment on them, and destroy the impious, and fight with all carnal men for all things which sinners and impious men have done and wrought against Him."

17, 18.] Exhortation to remember how the Apostles forewarned them of these men.—But ye, beloved (see again below, ver. 20), remember the words which were before spoken by the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ (this can hardly be cited as evidence on one side or the other on the question whether St. Jude himself was an Apostle. He might use the expression, being himself an Apostle: he is certainly more likely to have used it, not being one. According to the critical text, St. Peter uses the same expression, without the "us," 2 Pet. iii. 2: and whichever view is taken as to the genuineness or otherwise of 2 Peter, there could be no intention by such an expression to exclude either the real or the pretended St. Peter from the number of the Apostles), that they told you (whether by writing, or by word of mouth, does not appear: so that we cannot say, with Bengel, "hence we see that they to whom Jude is writing, had heard the other Apostles also." It is worthy of remark that he does not say they told us, but you; hereby again not indeed making it certain that he included himself among the Apostles, but making it very uncertain, whether he intends to exclude himself) that at the last of the time (see notes on 2 Pet. iii. 3: Heb. i. 2: 1 Pet. i. 20: i.e., at the end of the world, in the last age of the Church) there shall be scoffers (men who sport with what is holy and good. The prophecy is contained in 2 Tim. iii. 1, 1 Tim. iv. 1, Acts xx. 29, and doubtless formed a constant subject of viva voce warning. 2 Pet. iii. 1, 2, can hardly be supposed to be referred to, for that place is, as this, a reminiscence of things before said by the Apostles, and nearly in the same words), walking according to their own lusts of impieties (so literally; indicating the direction, or perhaps the character of those desires. Compare the same words above, ver. 16).

19.] Last characteristics of these men. These are they that separate (or "are separating," viz. from the Church, having no real sympathy with the spirit of the Gospel:—that draw lines of distinction, by walking after their own desires, not in the path of the Church's obedience, thus separating both themselves from you, and you from themselves), sensual (we have no English word for the quality here implied in the Greek word psychikos; and our biblical psychology is, by this defect, entirely at fault. The psyche is the centre of the personal being, the "I" of each individual. It is in each man bound to the spirit, man's higher part, and to the body, man's lower part; drawn upwards by the one, downwards by the other. He who

He who rests midway, thinking only of self and self's interests, whether animal or intellectual, is the psychikos, the selfish man, the man in whom the spirit is sunk and degraded into subordination to the subordinate psyche. In the lack of any adequate word, I have retained the "sensual" of the A. V., though the impression which it gives is a wrong one: "selfish" would be as bad, for the psychikos may be an amiable and generous man; "animal" would be worse: "intellectual," worse still. If the word were not so ill-looking in our language, "psychic" would be a great gain), not having the spirit (see above, not directly the Holy Spirit of God, but the higher spiritual life of man's spirit in communion with the Holy Spirit. These men have not indeed ceased to have a spirit, as a part of their own tripartite nature: but they have ceased to possess it in any worthy sense: it is degraded beneath and under the power of the psyche, the personal life, so as to have no real vitality of its own).

Elsewhere in Scripture, CHRIST is this foundation, see 1 Cor. i. 11; which in fact comes to the same, for He is the Author and Finisher of our faith, the alpha and omega), praying in the Holy Spirit (as the means of thus building yourselves up. The expression is not found elsewhere, but is in strict analogy with Scripture usage: compare "speaking in the Spirit,"—also Rom. viii. 26, Eph. vi. 18), keep yourselves (in the original, said of the one great life-long act to be accomplished by the building up and praying) in the love of God (within that region of peculiar love wherewith God regards all who are built up on the faith and sustained by prayer: of God being a subjective genitive, "God's love," not objective, the love towards God. The expression is very like "abide in my love," John xv. 9, where "I also loved you" preceding fixes the meaning to be Christ's love to them), looking for (present participle, as in Tit. ii. 13, where see note. It is to be the habit of the life, as those other present participles, building up and praying) the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ (viz. that which He will shew at His coming. Huther remarks that mercy, more usually predicated of the Father, is in the addresses of the Pastoral Epistles, and of 2 John, attributed to the Father and Son jointly) unto eternal life (these words may be joined with mercy,—that mercy, whose issue shall be eternal life; or with looking for,—as the issue and aim of the expectation; or with keep yourselves,—as the final terminus of that watchful guarding. Perhaps the right choice between the three will be to combine the two last: for keep yourselves is subordinate and conditional to looking for: "keep yourselves . . . in expectation of . . . unto"). The direct and studied reference to the Blessed Trinity will not escape the reader. b) vv. 22, 23.]

original word which suit the context.—This is the first class: that of those who oppose themselves, who must be convicted and down-argued. According to the commonly received text, the rendering will be, as A. V., “of some have compassion, making a difference,” viz., between them and the others; but others save (attempt to save; this, and not the absolute command, is implied in the original word), snatching them from the fire (the same passage in the prophets, Zech. iii. 1—3, which has already been before St. Jude’s mind in ver. 9, again furnishes him with the material of this figure. There we read, “Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?” compare also Amos iv. 11. The fire is most probably not future eternal fire: but the present hell into which their corrupt doctrines and practices have cast them, not however without reference to its ending in fire eternal. This is the second class; including, perhaps, any over whom your influence extends, as younger members of the Church, &c., whom you can thus rescue by snatching them out of the fire of temptation and peril), and others compassionate in fear (on what account, is shewn by what follows: “lest you yourselves should suffer pollution.” This is the third class: consisting of those whom not falling in the way of so as personally to convict, nor having influence over so as to rescue, the believers could only compassionate [and on occasion given, lovingly help] as led away hopelessly to their ruin: but in shewing such compassion, they were to maintain a wholesome fear of their deadly error, for fear they themselves should become defiled by it.—The following clause is explanatory of “in fear”), hating (not, “seeing that ye hate,” nor “though ye hate:” the present participle simply falls under and expands the former clause, thus forming part of the command) even the (or, “their”) garment which has received defilement from the flesh (hating not merely fleshly pollution itself, but even the traces and outskirts of it; even that, be it what it may, which has its mark and stain upon it. On the sense, see Rev. iii. 4).

24, 25.] CONCLUDING DOXOLOGY, conceived in terms referring to their state of danger and necessity of divine upholding. But (this word, as in Rom. xvi. 25, closes off all other considerations and sums up all in this one. It is not at all given by the “now” of the A. V., which conveys a strictly temporal idea to the hearer) to Him that is able (exactly thus, Rom. xvi. 25) to keep you without falling, and to set [you] before-the-presence-of His glory (which will be revealed when the Son of man shall come, in His glory, and of His Father, and of the holy angels, Luke ix. 26, in the “manifestation of the glory of the great God and of our Saviour Jesus Christ,” Tit. ii. 13) blameless (see 1 Thess. iii. 13) in (element, in which they will be found) great-rejoicing (the word signifies the exuberance of triumphant joy: the corresponding verb occurs in 1 Pet. i. 6). to the only God our Saviour through Jesus Christ our Lord (on the union of God with Saviour, see Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles, § 1. 34. Observe the qualification here), be glory, majesty, might and power, before all time (before the whole age, i. e., of the world. Thus we have eternity past), and now (thus, time present), and to all the ages (thus, eternity future).—Amen (the ordinary conclusion of a doxology: compare Rom. i. 15, 1 Pet. iv. 11 [and 2 Pet. iii. 18, where, as here, it stands at the end of the Epistle]).

CHAP. I. 1—3.] SUPERScription: in which the contents and Writer of the book are declared, and the importance of its subject indicated by a blessing on those who shall read and hear it.

The Revelation (revelation) imports the manifestation of holy mysteries by the enlightening of the leading faculties of the soul, either by divinely imparted dreams, or in a waking vision by divine illumination. Here, the word need not be taken in any but this its general sense, as in 2 Cor. xii. 1, where it is plural; the particular purpose of this revelation follows) of Jesus Christ (how is this genitive to be understood? Is our Lord the subject or the object? Clearly here the former: for it is not Christ who is here revealed, except in a remote sense: but Christ who reveals, as is plain in what follows), which God (the Father) gave to Him (Stern asks, "How are we to understand this? Is not Christ very God, of one essence with the Father from eternity? Did He not, by virtue of the omniscience of His divine nature, know as exactly as the Father, what should be the process of the world's history, what the fate of the Church? What purpose was served by a revelation from God to Jesus?" He proceeds to say that the words cannot refer merely to the revelation as made to us, but are clearly against such an interpretation: and gives, at some length and very well, that which in one form or other all will accept as the true explanation, in accordance with John vii. 16, xiv. 10, xvii. 7, 8. The man Christ Jesus, even in His glorified state, receives from the Father, by his hypostatic union with Him, that revelation which by His Spirit He imparts to His Church. For, Acts i. 7, the times and seasons are kept by the Father in His own power: and of the day and the hour knoweth no man, not the angels in heaven, nor even the Son, but the Father only, Mark xiii. 32. I may observe, that the coincidence in statement of this deep point of doctrine between the Gospel of St. John and the Apocalypse, is at least remarkable), to shew (is this infinitive of the purpose dependent on the verb gave, or on the substantive revelation? Is it the purpose of God in giving, or the purpose of the revelation in revealing, that is asserted? At all events, Heinrichs is wrong, who takes together, "which God gave [empowered] Him to shew." But of the others, the construction with gave is the more probable, as being the more usual: "that He might shew," &c. And the verb shew must not here be confined to its stricter meaning of shewing in vision: for then we must confine the reference of "his servants" to the Apocalyptic Seer alone: but must be taken in its wider sense of exhibiting as knowledge, informing of. So in Matt. xvi. 21) to His (Christ's, most probably, as below in this verse, and ch. ii. 20: for thus the He is kept to the same subject throughout) servants (here meaning all Christians, not prophets only. That John himself is one of these servants below, does not affect this general meaning) what things must (by the necessity of the divine decree: see Matt. xvii. 10, xxiv. 6, xxvi. 54 al.) come to pass shortly (i.e. before long). The context, the repetition below, "for the time is at hand," and the parallel ch. xxii. 6, followed, ver. 7, by "Lo, I come quickly," fix this meaning here, as distinguished from the other of 'swiftly,' which is also precluded by the form of construction in the original. This expression must not be urged to signify that the events of apocalyptic prophecy were to be close at hand: for we have a key to its meaning in Luke xviii. 8, where our Lord says, "Shall not God avenge His elect, which cry unto Him day and night, even if He is long-suffering with them? I say unto you that He will avenge them shortly:" where long delay is evidently implied. Hengstenberg repudiates this, and says it is self-evident that these words can only be adduced here "by a wrong method of interpretation." But surely the two cases are exactly parallel: and his strong language here, as elsewhere, proves nothing. His own interpretation of the words, natural as he seems to think it, is forced and unwarrantable. He (in common with many others) takes them to mean that the events spoken of would very soon begin to take place. The axe, he says, lay at the root of the Roman Empire when John wrote this, as it did at the root of the Persian Empire when Daniel wrote. But this interpretation is not borne out by the Greek. The words cannot signify "which must soon begin to come to pass," but, "which, in their entirety, must soon come to pass." So that we are driven to the very same sense of shortly as that in Luke xviii. above, viz. to God's speedy time, though He seem to delay: in spite of the scorn which Hengstenberg pours on this meaning. His maxim, that a Prophet, speaking to men, must speak according to men's ideas, is quite worthless, and may be confuted by any similar prophetic saying, even by the one which he brings in its favour, Hagg. ii. 7: and his complaint, that thus we make the Seer and even the Lord Himself like bad physicians who delude their patients with false hopes [so, in the main, Stern also], is unworthy of a Christian Expositor, after our Lord's own plain use of the same method of speech again and again in His prophecies in the Gospels and in this book. It remains to observe, that these words cannot with any fairness be used as furnishing a guide to the interpretation of the prophecy. They are far rather to be regarded as a prophetic formula, common with Him to whom a thousand years are as one day, and used in order to teach us how short our time, and the time of this our world, is. See on the whole, Ewald's able note, and his remarks on the absurdity of Hengstenberg's pressing the words in favour of his praterist scheme); and He (Jesus Christ, not God, see ch. xxii. 16: the subject is changed, and the relative construction abandoned. So almost all Commentators) signified [it] sending by His angel (the Angel mentioned is the same who informs the Seer in chap. xvii. 1, 7, 15, xix. 9, xxi. 9, xxii. 1, 6, which latter place takes up this; ib. 8 ff.; and who is spoken of by our Lord ib. 16. It is remarkable that this angel does not appear as the imparter of the visions until ch. xvii. Some indeed, as Ewald, have fancied that they trace his presence in ch. iv. 1 and throughout: but ch. xvii. 1 is too manifestly the introduction to a new appearance for this to be the case; and previously to that the Seer receives his information from different persons. Our Lord Himself opens the Apocalyptic vision; but it is another voice which calls John up to the place of heavenly vision, ch. iv. 1. In vii. 13, one of the four and twenty elders speaks to him: in x. 8, it is the former voice again which addresses him, and in ib. 9, it is the angel who stands on the earth and the sea that gives him the book. Only in the great close of the prophecy, opening with ch. xvii., does one angel stand by him; referred to, as here, under the name the angel. In the visions of Daniel and Zechariah an angel mediated: Dan. viii. 16, ix. 20, x. 10 ff., Zech. i. 1, 19, al.) to His servant John (on the whole question of the writer of the book, see Introduction), 2.] who testified of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ, whatsoever things he saw (these words must, in all fairness of construction, be referred to this present book, and not, as by some of the older Expositors, and recently by Ebrard, to the Gospel of St. John. The reasons given by Ebrard for such reference will not hold: see my Greek Test. Besides, the Evangelist distinctly tells us, John xx. 30, that in writing his Gospel, he did not set down as much as he saw, but only a portion of the things which Jesus did in the presence of His disciples, whereas in the case of this Revelation it was otherwise: he set down all which he saw, as a faithful transmitter of the Apocalyptic vision to the churches).

3.] Blessed is (or be, in the ordinary meaning of blessed: not necessarily referring on to eternal blessedness, as Hengst.) he that readeth, and they that hear the words of the prophecy and observe the things written in it; for the time is near (it can hardly be reasonably denied that in the terms, he that readeth, and they that hear, the Apostle had in his mind the one public reader and the many hearers. And so the great majority of Commentators. If the words are to be thus understood as above, they form at least a solemn rebuke to the most unjustifiable practice of the Church of England, which omits with one or two exceptions the whole of this book from her public readings. Not one word of the precious messages of the Spirit to the Churches is ever heard in the public services of a Church never weary of appealing to her Scriptural liturgies. Surely it is high time, that our timid rulers should gather courage to face their duties, and such an omission should be supplied.— Notice that not three classes of persons, but two only, are here indicated: he that reads, and they that hear and do. those things which are written therein are the several exhortations to repentance, faith, patience, obedience, prayer, watchfulness, stedfastness, which are scattered up and down in the prophecy. The time being near makes the book of the more importance, and the blessedness of reading and observing it greater. The nearness spoken of is to be understood as alluding to the shortly of verse 1, which see. We know little now of relative nearness and distance in point of time: when the day of the Lord shall have opened our eyes to the true measure, we shall see, how near it always was).

CH. I. 4—III. 22.] INTRODUCTION TO THE PROPHECY, in the form of a sevenfold Epistle to the seven churches of Asia. And herein, vv. 4, 5, address and greeting, ending with doxology. [Ebrard, who seems to love singularity for its own sake, objects to the above arrangement, because the sevenfold epistle has not yet begun, and prefers calling this a dedicatory title to the whole book. But the other view is far simpler and better. The sevenfold Epistle is clearly before St. John's mind, and, full of the images of the vision which he had seen, he only interrupts it by solemn ejaculatory references to the glories of that vision and the sublime announcement of the Lord's coming, and then hastens on to introduce it by a prefatory account of his own circumstances when the Epistles were entrusted to him, and of the appearance of the Lord who thus entrusted them.] John to the seven churches which are in Asia (the form of address is exactly that in the Epistles of St. Paul: see Rom. i. 1 ff., 1 Cor. i. 1 ff., &c. That St. Paul, in Romans and elsewhere, is careful to designate himself and his office, and St. John introduces himself without any such designation, belongs doubtless in part to the individual character of the two Apostles, but is besides a strong testimony that the John who here writes needed no such designation in the eyes of those to whom he was writing. See this, and other evidence as to the authorship, urged in the Introduction. See on the seven churches below, ver. 11. Asia, as always in the New Test., is the proconsular province so called. It consisted of Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia: under Mysia and Lydia including Ionia and Eolia, and the neighbouring islands of the Aegean. It was called proconsular, because it was governed by one of consular rank, under the title of proconsul: Grace be to you and peace (so St. Paul in all his Epistles except the three pastoral) from Him who is and who was and who is to come (a paraphrase of the unspeakable name Jehorah, resembling the paraphrase "I AM THAT I AM" in Exod. iii. 14, for which the Jerusalem Targum has, as here, "HE WHO WAS AND IS AND IS TO COME:" as has the Targum of Jonathan in Deut. xxxii. 39. It follows from what is remarked above, that the meaning of is to come is not here to be pressed as referring to any future coming. By doing so we should confuse the meaning of the compound appellation, which evidently is all to be applied to the Father. By some He which is is supposed to mean the Father, which was the Son ["in the beginning was the Word"], and which is to come the Spirit, as ever proceeding forth and descending on the Church), and from the seven spirits which [are] before His throne (Andreas takes these for the seven principal angels [ch. viii. 2]: so also many other Commentators. But this is highly improbable, as these angels are never called "spirits," and as surely mere creatures, however exalted, would not be equalized with the Father and the Son as fountains of grace. The common view is doubtless right, which regards the seven as the energies of the Holy Spirit:—

"Thou the anointing Spirit art, Who dost thy sevenfold gifts impart:" but rather perhaps to be regarded as expressing His plenitude and perfection, than to be separately assigned as [but query?] in the lines following of the hymn Veni Creator Spiritus. The key to this expression, which is an anticipation of the visions afterwards to be related, is ch. v. 6, where see notes: as also on ch. iv. 5. The seven can hardly be entirely without allusion to the seven churches, and to the sevenfold imagery throughout. The number seven denotes completeness, and was much noted by the Jewish Commentators as occurring in the Old Test. The seven spirits betoken the completeness and universality of working of God's Holy Spirit, as the seven churches typify and indicate the whole church. The reference to Isa. xi. 2 is but lamely made out, there being there but six energies of the Spirit mentioned. That to Zech. iv. 2, 10 is more to the point: see notes as above), and from Jesus Christ (as we have before had the Father and the Holy Spirit mentioned as the sources of grace and peace, so now the Son, coming last, on account of that which is to follow respecting Him, which has respect to His threefold office of Prophet, King, and Priest: see however below), the faithful witness (see John xviii. 37, "To this end came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." It is to the general mission of the Redeemer to bear witness to the truth, and not merely to the apocalyptic portion of His testimony which is to follow, that this title must be referred. This book [ver. 2] is the testimony of Jesus Christ: but the title reaches far wider. Embracing as it does that testimony before Pontius Pilate, and indeed that of His whole life of witnessing to the truth, we can perhaps hardly say that it marks out his prophetic office with sufficient distinctness for us to believe it indicated here), the first-born of the dead (death is regarded as the womb of the earth, from which the resurrection

The firstfruits of them that sleep, 1 Cor. xv. 20, is quite a different figure), and the Ruler of the kings of the earth (this kingly office of Christ is reached through his death and resurrection. In Ps. lxxxix. 27, the combination of titles is much as here, "I will make him my firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth." See also Isa. lv. 4. "That which the Tempter held forth to Jesus, Matt. iv. 8, on condition of worshipping Him, He has now attained by the way of his humiliation unto death; viz. victory over the world, John xvi. 33." De Wette).—Now follows, consequent upon the glorious titles of Christ which have been enumerated, an ascription of praise to Him for his inestimable love to us.—Unto Him that loveth us (the present tense includes in itself the past, "that loved us," which is the feebler, as it is the more obvious reading. It is His ever-abiding character, that He loveth his own, John xiii. 1: out of that love sprang the mighty act of love which follows: but it did not exhaust its infinite depth: it endures now, as then. The waiting till He become, in the unfolding of the Father's purposes, the acknowledged Head over his Church, is in reality as great a proof of that love now, as the Cross was then) and washed (or, loosed: the difference between the two words in Greek is only that of one letter) us from our sins in His blood (the past tense here points to a definite event, viz. his sacrifice of Himself. In such an image as this, which occurs again ch. vii. 14, we have enwrapped together the double virtue of the atoning blood of Christ in justification, the deliverance from the guilt of sin, and sanctification, the deliverance from the power of sin: the forensic and the inherent purity, of both which it is the efficient medium: of the former by its application in faith, of the latter by such faith, in its power, uniting us to Him who is filled with the Spirit of holiness. See 1 John i. 7, and note), 6.] and he made [us] a kingdom (viz. the kingdom of God or of heaven, so much spoken of by our Lord Himself and his Apostles: consisting of those who are His, and consummated at His glorious coming. This kingdom is one in which His saints will themselves reign: see the parallel place ch. v. 10, where "and they shall reign upon the earth" is added: and Dan. vii. 27: but above all the place which is here referred to, Exod. xix. 6, "but ye shall be to me a royal priesthood and a holy nation" [1 Pet. ii. 9]), priests (the kingdom was the collective description: priests is the individual designation. See on the union of the two characters in the individual Christian, the note on 1 Pet. ii. 9) to (as belonging to; the Father being the ultimate object of reference, as His will is the origin, and His glory the result, of all that is brought about by the mediatorial work of Christ) God and His Father, to Him be (or, is, belongs: the like ambiguity is found in all doxological sentences) the glory and the might unto the ages (i. e. for ever. acting member is said to do that which the man does by its means. This is to be understood of the whole human race, risen and summoned before Him), and (among them: the and does not couple a separate class, but selects a prominent one) they which (said of the whole class: almost equivalent to "whoever:" "all they, who") pierced Him (see John xix. 36 f. and note. As there St. John evidently shews what a deep impression the whole circumstance here referred to produced on his own mind, so it is remarkable here that he should again take up the prophecy of Zechariah [xii. 10] which he there cites, and speak of it as fulfilled. That this should be so, and that it should be done with the same word pierced him, not found in the Septuagint version of the passage, is a strong presumption that the Gospel and the Apocalypse were written by the same person. The persons intended in this expression are beyond doubt those to whom our Lord prophesied in like terms, Matt. xxvi. 64; viz. those who were His murderers, whether the Jews who delivered Him to be crucified, or the Romans, who actually inflicted His death. That the meaning must not here be generalized to signify all who have by their sins crucified the Son of God afresh, is plain from the consideration that this class are taken out from among that indicated by "every eye shall see Him" which precedes, whereas on that supposition they would be identical with it; for we all have pierced Him in this sense), and all the tribes of the earth shall mourn at Him (i. e. their mourning shall be directed towards Him as its object: in fear for themselves in regard to the consequences of His coming. The prophecy is in allusion to Matt. xxiv. 30; and its sense, that all, even the holiest of men, shall mourn at the visible approach of that day. But as Bengel well remarks, there will be then two causes of mourning:

hostile terror, and penitential terror. The former will prevail in the impenitent and careless world; the latter even in the comforted and rejoicing church. The holiest saint, when that Presence is manifested, in the midst of his "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him and He will save us," will personally feel with St. Peter, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." The whole is an adaptation and amplification of the words of Zechariah xii. 10). Yea, Amen (both these words are used in 2 Cor. i. 20 as forms of ratification. Both together answer to the "Thus saith the Lord" of the prophets. Andreas remarks, that the Yea is according to the Greek usage, to shew the unchangeableness of the things said, the Amen according to the Hebrew usage, assuring us that no obstacle shall intervene so as to hinder their fulfilment). I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God, He that is and that was and that is to come, the Almighty (by whom are these words spoken? Certainly as they here stand, they must be understood as uttered by the Eternal Father. And similarly we find Him that sitteth on the throne speaking in ch. xxi. 5 ff. In our ver. 17, and in ch. xxii. 13, it is our Lord who speaks. Nor need we be surprised, that He who is of one essence with the Father should assert of Himself the same eternal being as the Father. This need not lead us to force the reference of any passage, but each must be ruled by considerations of its own context. Schöttgen gives examples of the Rabbinical usage of "from Aleph even to Tau," to signify "completely," "entirely;" and of the word A-th being a name of the glory of God, because it comprehends all the letters.

The title Almighty answers in the Septuagint version of the Old Test. to the Hebr. Jehovah Sabaoth, also to Shaddai).

Description of the Writer, and of the place where the Revelation was seen.

I John (so again ch. xxii. 8: so Daniel, viii. 1, ix. 2, x. 2) your brother (no inference can be drawn against the apostleship of the Writer from this his designation of himself. Indeed from his entire silence respecting himself in his Gospel, we may well believe that here, where mention of his name was absolutely required, it would be introduced thus humbly and unobtrusively), and fellow-partaker in the tribulation and kingdom and endurance [or, patience] in Jesus (the construction and arrangement are peculiar. The conjunction of these terms seems to be made to express, a partaker, as in the kingdom, so in the tribulation and endurance which are in and by Christ: but the insertion of kingdom between tribulation and endurance is startling. Probably, the tribulation brings in the kingdom [Acts xiv. 22], and then as a corrective to the idea that the kingdom in its blessed fulness was yet present, the endurance is subjoined. "John introduces three portions of inheritances in which he declares himself partaker. But the middle one of these, i.e. the kingdom, cannot be possessed, unless with the exercise of tribulation on the one side, and the defence of patience on the other." Ambrose Ansbert [8th century]), was (found myself) in the island which is called Patmos (see Introduction, § ii. par. 4) on account of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus (the substantives form the same expression as occurred before, ver. 2, where see note. There they indicated this portion of the divine word and testimony, of which John was a faithful reporter. Whether their meaning is the same here, will depend partly on what sense we assign to "on account of." In St. Paul's usage, it would here signify for the sake of, i.e. for the purpose of receiving: so that the Apostle would thus have gone to Patmos by special revelation in order to receive this revelation. Again, keeping to this meaning, these words may mean, that he had visited Patmos in pursuance of, for the purposes of, his ordinary apostolic employment, which might well be designated by these substantives. And such perhaps would have been our acceptance of the words, but that three objections intervene. 1) From what has preceded in this verse, a strong impression remains on the mind that St. John wrote this in a season of tribulation and persecution. Why should he throw over his address this tinge of suffering given by the tribulation and patience, if this were not the case? 2) The usage of our Writer himself in two passages where he speaks of death by persecution [ch. vi. 9, xx. 4] shews that with him on account of [or, for] in this connexion is "because of," "in consequence of." And St. John's own usage is a better guide in St. John's writings, than that of St. Paul. Besides which, Origen's Greek ear found no offence in this usage, for he incorporated it into his own sentence, . . . "He condemned John in his testimony, on account of the word of truth, to the island Patmos." 3) An early patristic tradition relates that St. John was banished to Patmos. See the authorities in the Introduction, and the question discussed, whether we are justified in ascribing this tradition solely to our present passage. These considerations, mainly those arising from the passage itself, compel us, I believe, to understand the words of an exile in Patmos).

10, 11.] I was ("Je me trouvais:" not merely "I was," but "I became") in the Spirit (i.e. in a state of spiritual ecstasy or trance, becoming thereby receptive of the vision or revelation to follow. That this is the meaning is distinctly shewn by the same phrase occurring in ch. iv. 2: where after seeing the door open in heaven, and hearing the "Come up hither," he adds, "immediately I became in the Spirit." See also ch. xxi. 10. Elrard well says, "Connexion with surrounding objects through the senses is suspended, and a connexion with the invisible world established." On the attempt made by some to give the words a different meaning, see below) on the Lord's day (i. e. on the first day of the week, kept by the Christian church as the weekly festival of the Lord's resurrection. On any probable hypothesis of the date of this book, this is the earliest mention of the day by this name. This circumstance, coupled with a bias in favour of a peculiar method of interpretation, has led certain modern interpreters, of whom, as far as I know, Wetstein was the first, to interpret the words of the day of the Lord's coming. So Züllig, and in our own country, Drs. S. R. Maitland and Todd. But 1) the difficulty of the thus early occurrence of this term, "the Lord's day," is no real one. Dr. Maitland says [see Todd's Lectures on the Apoc., Note B, p. 295], "I know of nothing in the Scripture or in the works of the ante-Nicene Fathers on which to ground such an assumption." To this we may answer, that the extent of Dr. Maitland's knowledge of the ante-Nicene Fathers does not, happily for us, decide the question: as the expression occurs repeatedly in those very Fathers: see the citations in my Greek Test. Mr. Elliott, Hor. Apoc. iv. 367 note, has pointed out that the primitive Syriac version renders 1 Cor. xi. 20, "not as becometh the day of the Lord ye eat and drink," which is an interesting proof of the early usage. This chronological objection being disposed of, and the matter 2) taken on its own merits, it really is astonishing how any even moderate Greek scholars can persuade themselves that the words can mean that which these Commentators maintain. See this shewn in my Greek Test.): and I heard a voice (see Ezek. iii. 12) behind me (Isa. xxx. 21), great as of a trumpet, saying (the trumpet is the instrument of festal proclamation, Numb. x. 10: John ii. 15, &c.: accompanies divine manifestations, Exod. xix. 19 f.; Joel ii. 1: Matt. xxiv. 31; 1 Thess. iv. 16. The similarity to the sound of the trumpet here was in the loudness and clearness of the voice: see also ch. iv. 1. From this latter it appears that this voice was not that of our Lord, but of one who there also spoke to the Apostle. Düsterdieck remarks that behind me leaves an indefiniteness as to the speaker), What thou seest (the present carries on the action through the vision now opening,—"what thou art seeing") write (forthwith) into a book, and send to the seven churches, to Ephesus, and to Smyrna, and to Pergamus, and to Thyatira, and to Sardis, and to Philadelphia, and to Laodicea (for all particulars respecting these churches, see the Introduction, § ii.).

voice it was): and when I had turned about I saw seven golden candlesticks (the seven golden candlesticks are [united in one] part of the furniture of the tabernacle, Exod. xxv. 31 ff. Again, in Zech. iv. 2, 11, we have the "candlestick, all of gold," with its seven lamps. Here there are seven separate candlesticks, typifying, as that one, the entire church, but now no longer bound together in one outward unity and one place. Each local church has now its candlestick, to be retained or removed from its place according to its own works): <sup>13.</sup> and in the midst of the candlesticks one like to the Son of Man (i. e. to Christ: see John v. 27: not simply, "to a son of man"), clothed in a garment reaching to the feet (see the refl. in Daniel and Ezekiel, which the description and even the diction closely resemble. This long garment was a sign of high rank or office. Arethas supposes the dress to be that of the Melchisedek-priesthood; but without reason. See Ecclus. vii. 8, "If thou followest righteousness, thou shalt obtain her, and put her on, as a glorious long robe"), and girt round at the breasts with a golden girdle (in Dan. x. 5, Gabriel has his loins girt with gold of Uphaz. Some suppose a distinction—the girding round the loins betokening activity, while that round the breast is a sign of repose. But Hengstenberg well observes that this would hardly apply: for Christ is here in fulness of energy as ruler and orderer of His Church. Ebrard seems nearer the truth in regarding the higher girding as a sign of majesty. But perhaps after all the point is not to be pressed; for the angels in ch. xv. 6 are also girt round the breasts. Nor is the golden girdle distinctive of regal majesty: for this they also bear, ibid.):

<sup>14.</sup> and his head and his hairs [were] white like white wool, as snow (by the head is perhaps indicated the forehead; not the face, which is afterwards described. It is only in colour, not in material, that His hair is compared to white wool; and the words, as snow, are afterwards added to impress this still more. The whiteness signifies purity and glory, not as Augustine and others think, eternity, either here or in Dan. vii. 9), and his eyes as a flame of fire (so Dan. x. 6: representing perhaps, as Vitringa says, "the perspicacity of the divine and pure mind, piercing all secrets." This may be, notwithstanding that Gabriel has eyes like lamps of fire in Daniel. Though omniscience could not be ascribed to him, the figure might be relatively consistent. But it is perhaps better to consider these physical details rather as in themselves characteristic, than as emblematic of attributes lying beneath them. The "fiery eye" among the sons of men, is indicative of energy and power of command: so also in the Son of man Himself):

<sup>15.</sup> and his feet were like to chalcobanus (so literally. This word has defeated all the ingenuity of Commentators hitherto. I have in my Greek Testament discussed the various conjectures, which mostly vary between a kind of brass and a species of incense), as if they had been burnt in a furnace (and so red-hot and glowing): and his voice as the voice of many waters (Ebrard sees an allusion to the quiet and majestic sound of the sea, appealing to ch. xvii. 1 and xiii. 1; but, as Düsterdieck remarks, there seems to be no such allusion here, but only to the power of the voice as resembling the rushing of many waters. So Dan. x. 6; Ezek. xlii. 2, where the same expression is found, i. 24, where the sound of the wings of the creatures is “as the noise of great water”).

16.] And having (St. John takes up the description from time to time irrespective of the construction, as if with separate strokes of the pencil) in his right hand seven stars (not on his right hand, as a number of jewelled rings, but in his right hand, as a wreath or garland, held in it. De Wette well remarks that this, which is the more natural rendering, is also required by the symbolism. If the seven churches which the seven stars symbolize, were on the Lord's hand as rings, they would seem to be serving (adorning?) Him, and not to be the objects of his action: but now that He holds them in his hand, He appears as their Guardian, their Provider, their Nonriser: and, we may add, their Possessor, who brings them out and puts them forth to be seen when He pleases. His universal Church would hardly be thus represented, but only a portion of it which it pleases Him to take in his hand and hold forth as representing the rest): and out of his mouth a two-edged sharp sword going forth (compare Isa. xi. 4, xlix. 2: also our ch. ii. 16, and Wisd. xviii. 15. The same figure occurs with reference to men in Ps. lv. 21, lvii. 4, lix. 7: and examples of it are given from the Rabbinical writings. The thing signified may perhaps be as in 2 Thess. ii. 8, and in ch. xix. 21; but clearly we must not exclude the attributes of the word of God, Heb. iv. 12, Eph. vi. 17. And this all the more, inasmuch as 1) here the Lord is represented not as taking vengeance on his enemies, but as speaking with his own, both in the way of comforting and of threatening: and 2) in ch. xix. 21, where this very sword is again alluded to as slaying the Lord's enemies, His title as sitting upon the horse is “the word of God”): and his countenance (not general appearance. Had this been so, how should the Apostle have noted the details just mentioned? for the whole figure of our Lord would have been too dazzling for him to contemplate. It is natural that after describing the eyes, and that which proceeded from the mouth, he should give the general effect of the countenance) as the sun shineth in his strength (see Judges v. 31: —that is, when unclouded and in full power: not necessarily at midday, but at any time. The construction is again broken: “as the sun shining” would be the regular connexion).

17, 18.] And when I saw Him, I fell at his feet as dead (the effect of the divine appearance: see Exod. xxxiii. 20; Job xli. 6; Isa. vi. 5; Ezek. i. 28; Dan. viii. 17 ff., x. 7 ff. There is no discrepancy in this bodily action with the spiritual nature of the vision, as De Wette thinks, either here or in the places where similar physical effects are described, ch. v. 4, xix. 10, xxii. 8 [Dan. vii. 15]. Düsterdieck well remarks in reply, that the being in the Spirit does not supersede existence in the body. Just as dreamers express their bodily feelings by physical acts, e.g. by starting or weeping, so might St. John while in this ecstasy: see Acts ix. 3). And he placed his right hand upon me, saying, Fear not (see Dan. x. 12, Luke i. 13, 30, ii. 10, Matt. xvii. 7, Mark xvi. 6. These places, and the whole character of our Lord's words, shew that the Apostle's falling down as dead was purely from fear, not, as Ebrard imagines, as an expression of ecstatic love); I am the first and the last (see ver. 11 above: this is the meaning here, not as the semi-Socinian Commentators explain it, "both highest in dignity and also most humiliated:" it is the eternity of God which is expressed—of Him who is before all and after all, from and to everlasting), and the living One (not the life-giving One, however true the fact may be; nor here signifying alive from the dead; but it is the well-known attribute of God, the Eternal, not in bare duration, but in personal life. The giving life is included, but the word expresses far more. The A. V. is wrong in connecting these words with those that follow); and I was (I became: it was a state which I passed into) dead, and, behold, I am alive for evermore (see Rom. vi. 9, Acts xiii. 34. am alive expresses more emphatically than would the simple verb "live," the residence and effluence of life. By this mention of His own death and revival, the Lord reassures His Apostle. He is not only the living One in His majesty, but He has passed through death as one of us, and is come to confer life even in and through death); and I have the keys of death and of Hadés (not, of hell: the two words should never be confounded. I can bring up from death, yea even from the mysterious place of the spirits of the departed. The figure of the keys is often used in this book; see ch. iii. 7: ix. 1: xx. 1. The Targum of Jonathan on Deut. xxviii. 12 says, "There are four keys in the hand of the Lord . . . the key of life, of the tombs, of food, and of rain." We have the gates of death as opposed to the gates of the daughter of Zion, Ps. ix. 14; cf. also Job xxxviii. 17; and the gates of Hadés, Matt. xvi. 16, Isa. xxxviii. 10). 19.] Write therefore ('because I have vouchsafed thee this vision,—I whose majesty is such, and whose manifested loving-kindness to thee.' The connexion is better thus than with ver. 11, as some: "Now that thy fear is over, write what I bade thee." But it is very doubtful whether ver. 11 is spoken by our Lord at all: see there) the things which thou sawest (just now: the vision which was but now vouchsafed thee), and what things they are (two meanings of the words thus rendered are possible. 1) 'the things which are,' viz. which exist at the present time. This has been taken by many Commentators, ancient and modern. 2) as above, "what things they [the things which thou sawest] are," i. e. signify: so some of the ancients and moderns. Both on account of the construction in the original [see my Greek Test.], and because the verb are, unquestionably in this meaning of signify, occurs twice in the next verse, I have no hesitation in taking this latter meaning, as given above), and the things which are about to happen after these (viz. after the things which thou sawest: the next vision, beginning with ch. iv., which itself opens with "after these things I saw." I would take the verb be in the sense of happening, not in the wide ages of history, but in apocalyptic vision: seeing that, these things meaning "the things which thou sawest," a present vision, the things which shall be will by analogy mean the things which shall succeed these, i. e. a future vision. Notice, it is not "the things which must come to pass," as in ver. 1: not the necessity of prophecy, but only the sequence of things seen); 20.] the mystery (i. e. the secret signification) of the seven stars which thou sawest upon (held in, and so standing over, as a wreath) my right hand, and the seven candlesticks of gold (elliptic construction for 'and the mystery of the seven candlesticks,'

&c.).—The seven stars are (signify) [the] angels of the seven churches: and the seven candlesticks are seven churches (the import of the angels has been much disputed. Very many both ancient and modern Commentators take them for the presiding presbyters, or bishops, of the churches. This view is variously supported. It derives probability from the analogy of the vision itself, in which, seeing that the candelabra represent the churches themselves, existing vessels containing much light, the stars, concentrated sparks of light, should represent some actually existing persons in or connected with the churches. Again it is supported by our finding that throughout the seven Epistles the angel is treated as representing and responsible for the particular church. But before we pass on to the other great section of interpretation, we may at once dismiss those forms of this one which make the angel the ideal representative of the governing body, or an ideal messenger from the church, or an anticipatory idea of the office of Bishop, not yet instituted: or, in short, any idealism at all. As the church is an objective reality, so must the angel be, of whatever kind. This consideration will also affect the current of interpretation which takes the angels to be the churches themselves. The second line of interpretation is that which regards them as angels, in some way representing the churches. In favour of this is 1) the constant usage of this book, in which the word angel occurs only in this sense: 2) the further usage of this book, in which we have, ch. xvi. 4, the angel of the waters introduced without any explanation, who can be none other than the angel presiding over the waters: 3) the expression of our Lord Himself, Matt. xviii. 10, "their angels in heaven do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven," coupled with that expressed by the church in the house of Mary the mother of John Mark, Acts xii. 15, with regard to their disbelief of Peter standing at the door, "it is his angel:" both asserting the doctrine that angels are allotted to persons, and are regarded as representing them: a subject full of mystery, and requiring circumspect treatment, but by no means to be put aside, as is commonly done. 4) The extension of this from individuals to nations in the book of Daniel, which is so often the key to apocalyptic interpretation. See Dan. x. 21, xii. 1: an analogy according to which there might well be angels not only of individuals, but of churches. 5) The fact that throughout these Epistles, nothing is ever addressed individually as to a teacher, but as to some one person reflecting as it were the complexion and fortunes of the church in a way in which no mere human teacher or ruler could. That there is no exception to this in ch. ii. 20, see maintained in note there. 6) To the objection advanced in the comment of Arethas, that "the presiding angel had not sinned, so as to want exhorting to repent, &c.," the reply may be made, with advantage to this interpretation, that there evidently is revealed to us a mysterious connexion between ministering angels and those to whom they minister, by which the former in some way are tinged by the fates and fortunes of the latter. E. g. in our Lord's saying cited above, the place of dignity there asserted of the angels of the little children is unquestionably connected with the character of those whose angels they are: and it cannot be following out such a revelation too far to say that, if some of the holy angels are thus and for this reason advanced to honour, others may be similarly, and for the opposite reason, placed in less honour and relatively disgraced. That this idea is found expressed in the Rabbinical writings is a mark of the further development of the truth, which seems to have been first revealed to Daniel. 7) It will be perceived that this interpretation does not lie under any of the objections stated above as idealizing that which ought to be an objective reality. For it contemplates the angels of the churches as really existent, not as ideal beings. It is only when this latter is the case, that those objections can apply. 8) It will also be perceived, that both the circumstances, which were cited as making for the former interpretation, tell equally for this: viz. a) that just noticed, the actual existence of these persons in or belonging to the churches, and b) the fact that in the Epistles the angel is treated as representing and responsible for the particular church.

So that I cannot but regard this second view as far the more likely one. It has been taken by Origen, Jerome, and several more of the ancients, and by many among the moderns.

The attempt to defend the interpretation of angels as bishops by the analogy of the legate of the congregation, in the synagogue, appears to be futile, inasmuch as that officer held quite an inferior place, in no way corresponding to a bishop, or any kind of president of the church.

As regards the symbolism, stars are the symbols of the angels of the churches, inasmuch as angels are beings of light, Heb. i. 7 [from Ps. civ. 4], where see note; Job xxxviii. 4, where they are called the morning stars. The same symbolism is used in the prophets of Lucifer, the day-star, the son of the morning, Isa. xiv. 12 ff., who would exalt his throne above the stars of God, ib. ver. 13; Rev. xii. 4, 9. See also Luke x. 18. That stars are also used to symbolize earthly authorities, is what might be expected from the very nature of the symbol, and should never have been alleged here as a reason against the literal interpretation of angels. The churches themselves are represented by candlesticks, agreeably with the universal symbolism both of the prophetic and evangelic Scriptures. Compare Prov. iv. 18; Isa. lx. 1, 3; Matt. v. 14, 16; Luke xii. 35; Phil. ii. 15).

CH. II. 1—III. 22.] THE EPISTLES TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES. Views have considerably differed respecting the character of these Epistles, whether they are to be regarded as simply historical, or historico-prophetical, or simply prophetical. The point on which all, I presume, will be agreed is, that the words contained in these Epistles are applicable to and intended for the guidance, warning, and encouragement of the whole Church Catholic, and its several parts, throughout all time. The differing interpretations will here be only briefly alluded to. One account of them will be found in Vitringa's (Latin)

Commentary, pp. 27—58: and (but scantily, as most interpreters pass over this portion of the book slightly) in the introductions to the principal commentaries. See also Abp. Trench's Appendix to his Commentary on the Seven Epistles, pp. 209—225.

Before commenting on each individual Epistle, I would notice the similar construction of all. This may be thus described. Each Epistle contains, 1. A command, to write to the angel of the particular church. 2. A sublime title of our Lord, taken for the most part from the imagery of the preceding vision. 3. An address to the angel of the church, always commencing with I know, introducing a statement of its present circumstances: continuing with an exhortation either to repentance or to constancy: and ending with a prophetic announcement, mostly respecting what shall be at the Lord's coming. 4. A promise made to "him that overcometh," generally accompanied with a solemn call to earnest attention, "He that hath an ear, &c."

1—7.]—THE EPISTLE TO THE CHURCH AT EPHESUS. To the angel of the church in Ephesus write; These things saith he that holdeth fast (compare ch. ii. 25, iii. 11) the seven stars in his right hand, He that walketh in the midst of the seven candlesticks of gold (assertions of Christ's being the Lord, the Governor and the Upholder of His Church, agreeably to the vision of ch. i.: coming in suitably in this first Epistle, as beginning the complete number): I know (am aware of: not as some explain it, approve). The context determines this to be the fact here, but not this word. The works might be bad ones, see John iii. 19) thy works (so in all the Epistles, except those to Smyrna and Pergamus), and thy labour (1 Cor. iii. 8, xv. 58, the same word), and endurance (labour and endurance [or, patience] form the active and the passive sides of the energizing Christian life.

The two are explanatory, in fact, of works; see 1 Cor. xv. 58: these being the resulting fruits of labour and patience, see ch. xiv. 13), and that thou canst not bear wicked persons (these are here regarded as a burden, an incubus, which the Ephesian church had thrown off. The assertion is as yet general: it is particularized in the next clause), and didst try (make experiment of) those who say that they are apostles, and are not, and didst find them false (this is deeply interesting in connexion with St. Paul's prophetic caution, Acts xx. 28—30. That which he foretold had come to pass, but they had profited by his apostolic warning): and hadst endurance, and didst bear (them, while trying them: or perhaps the verb is used absolutely) for my Name, and hast not been weary. Howbeit I have (nothing need be supplied: the following clause is the object to the verb "I have") against thee that thou hast left (deserted; or let go) thy love which was at first (towards whom? Arethas understands charity to thy neighbours. Grotius similarly, and others very variously. But there can I think be little question that the language is conjugal, and the love, as Ambrose Ansbart ["thou hast cast away the affection of a chaste spouse"], and others,—the first fervent chaste and pure love of the newly-wedded bride: see Jer. ii. 2. In what particular the Ephesian church had left her first love, is not stated. Perhaps, as Ansbart says, "she was excited with the love of this world:" or, seeing that it is negative, rather than positive delinquency which is blamed, the love of first conversion had waxed cold, and given place to a lifeless and formal orthodoxy). Remember therefore whence thou hast fallen (the first fervour of love is regarded as a height, from which the church had declined), and repent (quickly and effectually, as the tense in the original implies), and do the first works (the works which sprang from that thy first love: those resume); but if not, I [will] come to thee (not Christ's final coming, but his coming in special judgment is here indicated), and will move thy candlestick out of its place (i. e. will make thee cease to be a church: see the fulfilment noticed in Introduct., § iii. par. 7), if thou do not repent (shalt not have repented; i. e. by the speedy time indicated in the previous command). 6.] Notwithstanding, this thou hast (this one thing: there is no need to supply "good" or the like: of what sort this one thing is, is explained by what follows. We may notice the tender compassion of our blessed Lord, who, in his blame of a falling church, yet selects for praise one particular in which His mind is yet retained. This is for our comfort: but let us not forget that it is for our imitation also. "He in the midst of painful matters inserts encouraging ones, lest the church should be swallowed up by overmuch sorrow." Arethas [10th cen-

ture]], that thou hatest the works ("he says not, the Nicolaitans themselves, but their works: because the persons are to be loved in charity, but their vices had in detestation." Lyra. It would have been well for the church, had this always been remembered. the works, see below, must be referred to the moral delinquencies of this sect) of the Nicolaitans (there has been much dispute who these were. The prevailing opinion among the fathers was, that they were a sect founded by Nicolaus the proselyte of Antioch, one of the seven deacons. But there early becomes evident a desire to vindicate Nicolaus the deacon from the opprobrium of having been the founder of such a sect; and in consequence we soon find another Nicolaus substituted for the deacon of that name. An apocryphal Acts of the Apostles speaks of a Corinthian of this name, infamous for licentious practices. We come now to the second principal view with regard to this sect, which supposes their name to be symbolic, and Nicolaus to be the Greek rendering of Balaam, and to mean, "He ruined, or absorbed the people." Consequently the name Nicolaitans is said to be equivalent to Balaamites, as is also inferred from ver. 14. This view seems first to have been broached by Heumann in 1712, and since then has been the prevailing one. But in the first place, the names are by no means parallel; and next, the view derives no support from ver. 14 f., where the followers of Balaam are distinct from the Nicolaitans: see note there. And besides, there is no sort of reason for interpreting the name otherwise than historically. It occurs in a passage indicating simple matters of historical fact, just as the name Antipas does in ver. 13. If we do not gain trustworthy accounts of the sect from elsewhere, why not allow for the gulf which separates the history of the apostolic from that of the post-apostolic period, and be content with what we know of them from these two passages? There is nothing repugnant to verisimilitude in the report mentioned by the Fathers, that Nicolaus fell into impurities; nor need all of those who were chosen to aid the Apostles in distributing alms, have been even to the end of their lives spotless and infallible. At least it may be enough for us to believe that possible of one of them, which the post-apostolic Fathers did not hesitate to receive), which I also hate (this strong expression in the mouth of our Lord unquestionably points at deeds of abomination and impurity: compare Isa. lxi. 8; Jer. xlv. 4; Amos v. 21; Zech. viii. 17). <sup>7.]</sup> Solemn conclusion of the Epistle. He that hath an ear (no fanciful distinction must be imagined between the singular, and the plural which is found in the Gospels [Matt. xi. 15, xiii. 9, &c.]. We have precisely the same use of the singular in Matt. x. 27, where a distinction will hardly be maintained), let him hear what the Spirit (speaking in its fulness, through Him to whom it is given without measure, to John who was in the Spirit, in a state of spiritual ecstacy and receptivity: compare John xvi. 13) saith to the churches (Ebrard well notices that not a colon [or semi-colon, as in A. V.], but a full stop must be put here, as indeed might be shewn from the way in which the proclamation is repeated in ver. 29 and in ch. iii. 6, 13, 22. It directs attention, not to that which follows only, but to the whole contents of the seven Epistles), To him that conquereth (the verb is absolute, without any object expressed. So of Christ Himself in ch. iii. 21) I will give to him (so literally: the personal pronoun is repeated both idiomatically and for emphasis) to eat (i. e. I will permit him to eat: not in the ordinary sense of giving to eat: see ch. iii. 21) of [the fruit of] the tree (see Gen. ii. 9, from which the words come: and to suit which apparently the words in the midst of

The promise, and its expression, are in the closest connexion with our Lord's discourse in John vi., as will be seen by comparing Gen. iii. 22. But we need not therefore say that Christ is the tree of life here, nor confuse the figure by introducing one which in its character is distinct from it. Still less is the tree to be interpreted as being the Holy Spirit. See, for the imagery, ch. xxii. 2, 14, 19. The words of God, as following paradise, come from Ezek. xxviii. 13, and set forth the holiness and glory of that paradise, as consisting in God's dwelling and delighting in it).

8—11.] THE EPISTLE TO THE CHURCH AT SMYRNA. And to the angel of the church in Smyrna (in accordance with the idea of the angel representing the bishop, many of the ancient Commentators have inferred that Polycarp must have been here addressed. Whether this were chronologically possible, must depend on the date which we assign to the writing of the Apocalypse. He was martyred in A.D. 168, 86 years after his conversion) write; These things saith the first and the last, which was [became] dead and revived (see ch. i. 17, 18. The words here seem to point on to the promise in verses 10, 11): I know thy tribulation, and thy poverty (in outward wealth, arising probably from the tribulation, by the despoiling of the goods of the Christians); nevertheless thou art rich (spiritually; see 2 Cor. vi. 10, ch. iii. 18, and James ii. 5): and (I know) thy calumny from (arising from) those who profess themselves to be Jews, and they are not, but [are]

Satan's synagogue (these slanderers were in all probability actually Jews by birth, but not [see Rom. ii. 28; Matt. iii. 9; John viii. 33; 2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 4 ff.] in spiritual reality; the same who every where, in St. Paul's time and afterwards, were the most active enemies of the Christians. When Polycarp was martyred, we read that "all the multitude of Gentiles and Jews dwelling in Smyrna cried out enraged with a loud voice:" and afterwards when faggots were collected for the pile, "the Jews most eagerly, as is their wont, giving help." This view is strengthened by the context. Had they been, as some have supposed, Christians, called Jews in a mystical sense, they would hardly have been spoken of as the principal source of calumny against the Church, nor would the collective epithet of Satan's synagogue be given to them. Abp. Trench brings out there, how church, the nobler word, was chosen by our Lord and His Apostles for the assembly of the called in Christ, while synagogue, which is only once found [James ii. 2] of a Christian assembly [and there, as Dusterdieck notes, not with of God, but your], was gradually abandoned entirely to the Jews, so that in this, the last book of the canon, such an expression as this can be used. See the opposite in Numb. xvi. 3, xx. 4, xxxi. 16,—the Lord's synagogue [so in the Septuagint version]).

10.] Fear not the things which thou art about to suffer (in the ways mentioned below. The expression indicates manifold tribulation, as there): behold for certain (the expression in the original gives the tone of present certainty and actuality), the devil (it is understood from the context, that the devil would act through the hostility of human agents, and among them eminently these Jewish enemies) is about to cast [some] of you into prison (to be literally understood: the constant accompaniment of persecution, Acts xii. 3; xvi. 23), that ye may be tried (by temptations to fall away: not, that ye may be proved. This might be the end which Christ had in view in permitting the persecution: but the expression here rather gives the purpose of the agent in the previous clause, viz. the devil); and ye shall have tribulation ten days (the expression is probably used to signify a short and limited time: so in Gen. xxiv. 55; Judges xi. 19; Dan. i. 12: see also Num. xiv. 22; 1 Sam. i. 8; Job xix. 3; Acts xxv. 6. All kinds of fanciful interpretations have been given: see in my Greek Test.). Be (literally, become: new circumstances of trial requiring new kinds and degrees of fidelity; which does not remain as it is, but takes accession) thou (it is quite futile to attempt to distinguish in these Epistles between what is said to the Angel in the singular, and what is said to the Church in the plural. This is shewn by the former part of this verse, "thou art about to suffer," . . . followed by some of you. Only where there is occasion to discriminate, is the plural used: see v. 24 f.: but wherever the whole church is spoken of it is in the singular, under the person of its representative angel) faithful unto (not, "until:" but "even unto," i. e. up to the point or measure of: Let not thy faithfulness stop short of enduring

In this he shall have no part, nor it any power over him).

Andreas (cent. vi.) and Arethas (cent. x.) say, "He calls Pergamus the throne of Satan, as being idolatrous beyond the rest of Asia." But it may be doubted whether it was more idolatrous than e. g. Ephesus. And so Vitringa and Bengel. A more likely direction in which to find the solution is that taken by Lyra: "Satan's throne, that is, his power, in inclining the unbelievers to persecute the church:" for above, ver. 10, the act of persecution is ascribed to the devil: and here we learn by what follows, that he had carried it at Pergamus to the extent of putting Antipas to death; which seems not to have been reached elsewhere at this time. Whether this may have been owing to the fact of the residence of the supreme magistracy at Pergamus, or to some fanatical zeal of the inhabitants for the worship of Æsculapius, or to some particular person or persons dwelling there especially hostile to the followers of Christ, must remain uncertain.—I may remark, that it is plainly out of the question to attempt, as has been done by some, to connect such an expression as this with the prophecies of the latter portion of the book, and to anticipate for the insignificant Pergamus a leading place in their fulfilment. The expression is relevant, as the context shews, merely to the then existing state of the city, and not to any future part which it should take in the fulfilment of prophecy: and thou holdest fast my name (the profession of thy faith in Me), and didst not deny the faith of me in the days of Antipas my witness (martyr), my faithful one, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth (of Antipas, the shortened form of Antipater,—after the analogy of Hermas for Hermodorus, Lucas and Silas for Lucanus and Silvanus,—nothing is known to us with certainty, except from this passage. Andreas (cent. vi.) says that he had read the account of his martyrdom: and Arethas (cent. x.) says, that his “martyrdom” was still extant. Ribera gives an account from Simeon Metaphrastes, that he was bishop of Pergamus, and lived to extreme old age: and that when a persecution arose, in the time of Domitian, after having frequently witnessed a good confession he suffered death by being scorched in a hot brazen bull.

The Greek and Roman martyrologies contain similar accounts at his day, April 11th. Respecting the childish symbolic meanings which have been imagined for his name, in defiance of philology and of sobriety alike, see my Greek Test. On the words where Satan dwelleth, see above).

14, 15.] Nevertheless I have against thee a few things (used as a term of comparison with the far greater number of approved things which remained) [that] (i.e. “namely, that,” introducing the form of the indictment): thou hast there (in Pergamus: the locality is specified probably on account of the description which has been just given of it as the place where a faithful martyr had suffered unto death) men holding the teaching of Balaam (not simply “doctrine corresponding to the character of the advice of Balaam,” but used in strict correspondence with the words “who taught” following: that which a man teaches being his doctrine. And to hold this teaching, is to follow the teaching), who taught Balak (it is not expressly asserted in Num. xxxi. 16 that it was Balak whom Balaam advised to use this agency against Israel: but the narrative almost implies it: Balak was in power, and was the most likely person to authorize and put in force the scheme. And so Josephus makes Balaam on departing call to him Balak and the princes of Midian, and give them the advice) to put a stumblingblock (an occasion of sin) before (in the way, or before the face of) the sons of Israel, to eat (i.e. inducing them to eat) things offered to idols (from Num. xxv. 1, 2, it was not only participation in things offered to idols, but the actual offering sacrifices to them, of which the children of Israel were guilty. But seeing that the participation was that which was common to both, our Lord takes that as the point to be brought forward) and to commit fornication.

15.] Thus thou also hast (as well as those of old: not, as the Church at Ephesus, ver. 6) men holding (see above) the teaching of the Nicolaitans in like manner (viz. in eating things offered to idols, and fornication. We may remark, 1) that it is most according to the sense of the passage to understand these sins in the case of the Nicolaitans, as in that of those whom Balaam tempted, literally, and not mystically: 2) that the whole sense of the passage is against the idea of the identity of the Balaamites and the Nicolaitans: and would be in fact destroyed by it. The mere existence of the etymological relation is extremely doubtful [see above on ver. 6]: and even granting it,—to suppose the two identical, would be to destroy the historical illustration by which the present existing sect is described).

16.] Repent therefore (the command is addressed not only to the Nicolaitans, but to the church, which did not, like that of Ephesus, hate them, but apparently tolerated them): but if not, I [will] come to thee quickly (here again,—though in the common phrase which expresses the last great day,—not said of the Lord's final coming; as indeed the language shews, for then He will no longer "make war"), and will make war with them (the Nicolaitans) with (literally, in, as armed with or arrayed in) the sword of my mouth (many expositors suppose an allusion to the sword of the angel, armed with which he withstood Balaam in the way [Num. xxii. 23, 31], or to that and the sword by which those who sinned in the matter of Baalpeor [Num. xxv. 5] and eventually Balaam himself [Num. xxxi. 8] were slain: but seeing that the connexion with ch. i. 16 is so plainly asserted by our ver. 12, it seems better to confine the allusion to that sword, and not to stretch it to what after all is a very doubtful analogy).

17.] Conclusion. For the former clause see on ver. 7. We may notice that in these three first Epistles, the proclamation precedes the promise to him that conquereth: in the four last, it follows the promise.—To him that conquereth I will give to him (see above on ver. 7) of the manna which is hidden (in this manna, there is unmistakably an allusion to the proper and heavenly food of the children of Israel, as contrasted with the unhalloved idol-offerings; but beyond that, there is an allusion again [see above on ver. 7] to our Lord's discourse in John vi., where He describes Himself as the true bread from heaven: not that we need here, any more than in ver. 7 [see note there], confuse the present figure by literally pressing the symbolism of that chapter. Christ's gifts may all be summed up in the gift of Himself: on the other hand, He may describe any of the manifold properties of his own Person and office as His gift. This manna is hidden, in allusion partly perhaps to the fact of the pot of manna laid up in the ark in the holy of holies [Exod. xvi. 33: compare our ch. xi. 19: not to the Jewish fable, that a pot of manna was hidden by Josiah before the wasting of the temple, and shall again be produced in the time of the Messiah]:—but principally to the fact that our spiritual life, with its springs and nourishments, is hid with Christ in God, Col. iii. 3. See also Ps. lxxviii. 24; cv. 40), and I will give to him a white stone (see below), and on the stone a new name written, which none knoweth except he that receiveth it (the views concerning this stone have been very various. Bede interprets it "the body, now white by baptism, then refulgent with the glory of incorruption." But this is surely out of the question. Some have connected this with the mention of the manna, and cited the Rabbinical tradition, that with the manna fell precious stones and pearls. Others again think of the precious stones bearing the names of the twelve tribes on the breastplate of the High Priest, the order for which was contemporary with the giving of the manna, Exod. xxviii. 17; xxxix. 10, and regard this as indicating the priestly dignity of the victorious Christian. Ebrard remarks, that as the hidden manna was the reward for abstaining from idol-meat, so this for abstinence from fornication. Again Arethas and others have reminded us of the Gentile custom of presenting the victors at the games with a stone or ticket which entitled them to nourishment at the public expense, and to admission to royal festivals. Hence they regard the white stone as the ticket of admission to the heavenly feast. But it may be replied, 1) the feast is mentioned separately under the name of the hidden manna: and 2) the description of the writing on the stone, which follows, will not suit this view. Again, others, regarding the connexion of the white stone with the manna, refer to the use of the lot cast among the priests, which should offer the sacrifice: or to the writing a name, at election by ballot, on a stone or a bean: or to the custom of absolving criminals with a white stone and condemning them with a black one. Some expositors combine two or more of these expositions.

But it is against all these interpretations, that no one of them fits the conditions of this description. Each one halts in the explanation either of the stone itself, or of that which is written on it. Least of all, perhaps, does the last apply; the ver-diction of acquittal would be a strange reward indeed to one who has fought and overcome in the strength of an acquittal long ago obtained, Col. iii. 13. The most probable view is that which Bengel gives a hint of, and which Hengstenberg and Diisterdieck hold, that the figure is derived from the practice of using small stones, inscribed with writing, for various purposes, and that, further than this, the imagery belongs to the occasion itself only. Taking it thus, the colour is that of victory, see ch. iii. 3; vi. 2; iv. 4; xix. 14. The name inscribed yet remains for consideration. It is in this, as it would be in every case, the inscription which gives the stone its real value, being, as it is, a token of reward and approval from the Son of God. But what name is this? not what name in each case, for an answer to this question is precluded by the very terms, "which none, &c." but of what kind? Is it the name of Christ Himself, or of God in Christ? This supposition is precluded also by the same terms: for any mysterious name of God or of Christ would either be hidden from all [so ch. xix. 12], or known to all who were similarly victorious through grace. These very terms seem to require that it should be the recipient's own name, a new name however; a revelation of his everlasting title, as a son of God, to glory in Christ, but consisting of, and revealed in, those personal marks and signs of God's peculiar adoption of himself, which he and none else is acquainted with. "If the heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger intermeddleth not with its joy" [Prov. xiv. 10], then the deep secret dealings of God with each of us during those times, by which our sonship is assured and our spiritual strife carried onward to victory, can, when revealed to us in the other blessed state, be known thoroughly to ourselves only).

There is here probably a connexion with ver. 27, "as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to pieces," which will be the work of the strongly shod feet): I know thy works, and the love (this, standing first, is probably quite general, to God and man) and the faith (general again: not faithfulness, but in its ordinary sense) and the ministration (viz. to the sick and poor, and all that need it: the natural proof of love and faith—faith working by love, Gal. v. 6) and the endurance (in tribulation: or perhaps the "patient continuance in well-doing" of Rom. ii. 7) of thee; and (that) thy last works (are) more (in number, or importance, or both) than the first (this praise is the opposite of the blame conveyed by ver. 5 to the Ephesian church).

20.] Notwithstanding, I have against thee that thou sufferest thy wife Jezebel (on the whole, the evidence for thy being inserted in the text seems to me to preponderate. It could not well have been inserted: and was sure to have been erased, from its difficulty, and possibly from other reasons, considering what was the common interpretation of the angel. It does not create any real difficulty: finding its meaning not in the matter of fact at Thyatira, but in the history from which the appellation Jezebel is taken. In 1 Kings xxi. 25 we read, "Ahab, who did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord: whom

Jezebel his wife stirred up:" from which text the phrase is transferred entire, importing that this Jezebel was to the church at Thyatira what that other was to Ahab. It is not so easy to determine who is, or who are, imported by the term. The very fact of the name Jezebel being chosen [for it is impossible, even were this the actual name of a woman, that it should be used here with any other than the symbolic meaning], coupled with thy wife, as above explained, takes us out of the realms of simple fact into those of symbolism. The figure of "Jezebel thy wife" being once recognized in its historical import, it would not be needful that an individual woman should be found to answer to it: the conscience of the Thyatiran church could not fail to apply the severe reproof to whatever influence was being exerted in the direction here indicated. So that I should rate at very little the speculations of many Commentators on the supposed woman here pointed out. Düsterdieck, recently, remarks that the expression, which calleth herself a prophetess, has something individual about it. So it has: but may not this individuality belong just as well to the figure, as to the thing signified by it? The sect or individuals being once concentrated as Jezebel, this expression would follow of course, in the propriety of the figure. On the whole, however, I should feel it more probable that some individual teacher, high in repute and influence at the time, is pointed at. The denunciation of such a teacher under such a title would be at once startling and decisive. Nor would probability be violated by the other supposition, that a favoured and influential party in the Thyatiran church is designated. The church herself is represented by a woman: why may not a party [compare the Jews, who are the “synagogue of Satan” of ver. 9] within the church be similarly symbolized? However this may be, the real solution must lie hidden until all that is hidden shall be known. See more below, who calleth herself a prophetess (this clause perhaps points at an individual: but there is on the other hand no reason why a sect claiming prophetic gifts should not be indicated: the feminine belonging as before to the historical symbol), and she teacheth and deceiveth my servants, to commit fornication and eat things sacrificed to idols (hence the propriety of the name Jezebel: for both these were the abominations of the historical Jezebel: 2 Kings ix. 22, 30 [See Jer. iv. 30; Nahum iii. 4]: the latter indeed in its more aggravated form of actual idolatry, 1 Kings xviii. 19. This specification of the mischief done shews us that this influence at Thyatira was in the same direction as the evil works of the Nicolaitans at Pergamus, ver. 14. The fact that this was the prevalent direction of the false teaching of the day, is important in a chronological point of view: see Introduction, § iii. par. 6). And I gave her time (not, “in my pre-ordination of what is to be,” as in Mark xiii. 20, but denoting historically that which the Lord had actually done, in vain. Notice that the “suffering” her, on which depended the time given her for repentance, is yet blamed [ver. 20] in the church of Thyatira as a sin) that she should repent, and she willeth not to repent of (literally, “out of,” so as to come out of) her fornication (the word is here to be taken, as in all these passages, in its literal sense. Otherwise, if taken figuratively, it would be only a repetition of the other particular, idolatry). 22.] Behold (arrests attention, and prepares the way for something unexpected and terrible), I cast her (evidently against her will: but there is not necessarily violence in the word: it is the ordinary verb for being “cast” on a bed of sickness: so Matt. viii. 6, 14) into a bed (of sickness, see Ps. xli. 3: will change her bed of whoredom into a bed of anguish. So most Commentators. Perhaps the threat has reference to a future pestilence. Some understand the bed to be future punishment, referring to Isa. xiv. 11), and those who commit adultery (not now fornication, but a more general term, embracing in its wide meaning both the fornication and eating things sacrificed to idols, and well known as the word used of rebellious and idolatrous Israel, Jer. iii. 8, v. 7; Ezek. xvi. 32 &c.) together with her (not those who commit adultery with her, but those who, as well as she, commit adultery: those who share with her in her adulteries. These, as interpreted by the tone with which the rebuke began, will mean, those who by suffering and encouraging her, make themselves partakers of her sin. And this rather favours the idea that not one individual, but a dominant party, is intended. See below) into great tribulation (this clause forms a kind of parallelism with the former, so that into great tribulation is parallel with into a bed. But it is not to be regarded as interpreting the bed. Her punishment and that of her children [see below] is one thing; that of the partakers in her adulteries, those in the church who tolerated and encouraged her, another, viz. great tribulation. This is forcibly shewn by the words if they do not repent of her works following), if they do not (speedily and effectually, shall not have done so by the time which I have in my thoughts) repent of her (not their: they are Christ’s servants who are tampering with her temptations and allowing themselves in her works, which are alien from their own spiritual life) works. And her children (emphatically put forward as distinguished from the last mentioned: as if it were, "And as to her children, &c.") These are her proper adherents: not those who suffer her, but those who are begotten of her, and go to constitute her. Some Commentators have vainly dreamt of the slaughter of Ahab's seventy sons, 2 Kings x.: but they were not Jezebel's children. The historical figure is obviously dropped here) I will slay with death (the expression is probably a rendering of the Hebrew idiom, which the Septuagint renders by "to kill with death," and which occurs Lev. xx. 10, in reference to adultery. But we need not suppose a direct reference to that passage: for there is nothing of adultery here: we have done with that, and are come to the judgment on her children); and all the churches (this remarkable expression, meaning not, all the Asiatic churches, but all the churches in the world to the end of time, lifts the whole of this threatening and its accompanying encouragements out of provincial Asia, and gives us a glimpse into the universal character of these messages) shall know that I am he that searcheth the reins and the hearts (which, see Rom. viii. 29, is the attribute of God: and therefore of the Son of God. Compare ver. 18 above, and note. Grotius says, "By the reins are understood the desires," as also Ps. cxix. 13, Jer. xii. 2, Prov. xxiii. 16: by the heart, the thoughts, 1 Sam. xvi. 7, 1 Kings viii. 39 &c. But it seems doubtful whether so minute a distinction is in the words; whether they are not rather a general designation for the whole inward part of a man): and I will give to you ('will render, in My doom of judgment.' The strain of the Lord's message is suddenly changed into a direct address to those threatened) to each according to your works (not the mere outward products of the visible life, but the real acts and verities of the inward man, discerned by the piercing eye of the Son of God).

<sup>24</sup> ] But (contrast to those addressed before) to you I say, the rest who are in Thyatira, as many as have not (not only do not hold, but are free from any contact with) this teaching, such as have not known the depths (deep places) of Satan, as they call them (it was the characteristic of the falsely named Gnosis [Knowledge], to boast of its Batheia, or depths, of divine things. Tertullian says, in accusing the Valentinian heretics of dark deeds in secret, that if you ask plain questions about their mysteries, they knit their brows, and answer, "It is deep." We may safely therefore refer the expression to the heretics spoken of. But it is not so clear to whom, as their subject, the words as they call them are to be appropriated, and again whose words "of Satan" are, whether those 1) of our Lord, 2) of the heretics, or 3) of the Christians addressed. If they belong to the Christians, then the sense will be, that they, the Christians, called the depths of the heretics the depths of Satan, and were content to profess their ignorance of them. So far would be true enough; but the sentence would thus be left very flat and pointless, and altogether inconsistent in its tone with the solemn and pregnant words of the rest of the message. If the words as they call them belong to the heretics, we have our choice between two views of the words of Satan: either 1) that the heretics themselves called their own mysteries the depths of Satan. But this, though held by some as a possible alternative,—can hardly be so, seeing that the words surely would not bear the sense thus assigned to them, viz. that they could go deeper than and outwit Satan in his own kingdom: and seeing moreover, that no such formula, or any resembling it, is found as used by the ancient Gnostic heretics: or 2) that the words as they call them apply only to the word depths, and that, when, according to their way of speaking, "of God" should have followed [1 Cor. ii. 10], the Lord in indignation substitutes of Satan. This has been the sense taken by most Commentators. And it appears to me that this alone comes in any measure up to the requirements of the passage, in intensity of meaning and solemnity, as well as in likelihood; I cast not upon you any other burden (to what do the words refer? There can, I imagine, be little doubt as to the answer, if we remember some of the expressions used in the apostolic decree in which these very matters here in question, fornication and abstaining from unholy meats, were the only things forbidden to the Gentile converts. For our Lord here takes up and refers to those very words. In Acts xv. 28 we read, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things, that ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication." This act of simple obedience, and no deep matters beyond their reach, was what the Lord required of them. And this burden resolved itself into keeping the faith once delivered to the saints, as enjoined in the next sentence. The word has been very variously understood:—of the trouble given them by Jezebel and her followers:—of the punishments about to befall the heretics, which were not to be feared by the Christians:—of the burden of previous suffering implied in the word patience above,—and of the sense of "burden," so often occurring in the prophets when they denounce the divine threatenings. But to my mind the allusion to the apostolic decreed is too clear and prominent to allow of any other meaning coming into question: at least any other which sets that entirely aside. Others may be deduced and flow from that one, which have meaning for the church now that those former subjects of controversy have passed away; but ("only:" i. e., forget not that the licence just accorded involves this sacred obligation) that which ye have (see ch. iii. 11: not to be restricted in its sense to their steadfastness in resisting Jezebel and hers, but representing the sum total of Christian doctrine and hope and privilege; the "faith once for all delivered to the saints" of Jude 3), hold fast (the word in the original sets forth not so much the continuing habit, as the renewed and determined grasp of every intervening moment of the space prescribed) until the time when I shall come (the original gives an uncertainty when the time shall be, which we cannot convey in our language).

till I come." The authority here spoken of is that which shall be conferred on the saints when they shall inherit the earth, and reign with Christ in His Kingdom. It has been gradually realized, as the stone cut out without hands has broken in pieces other kingdoms; but shall only then find its entire fulfilment), and he shall govern (literally, "shall shepherd." It is the Septuagint rendering of a similar word signifying to break in pieces, which they have taken as an Hebrew verb signifying to shepherd, in Ps. ii. 9. The saying, as rendered by them, is sanctioned by being thrice quoted in this book, see ch. xii. 5, xix. 15) them with a rod of iron (a sceptre of severity: i. e. of inflexible justice), as the vessels of pottery are broken up (crushed, or shivered: the original gives the idea of the multitudinous fragments collapsing into an heap: the "broken to shivers" of the A.V. is very good), as I also have received from my Father (viz. in Ps. ii. 9, in which Psalm it is said, "Thou art my Son," ver. 7. The power there conferred on Me, I will delegate to my victorious servant). And I will give to him the star of the morning (it is not easy to say what, in strict exactness, these words import. The interpretations given are very various and inconsistent. The early Expositors, Andreas and Arethas, understand it of the Lucifer of Isa. xiv. 12, i. e. the devil, whom our Lord saw as lightning fall from heaven.—or, as there imported, the King of Babylon, the most powerful monarch on earth. Another ancient meaning given is the day-star arising in the hearts of the faithful, spoken of by St. Peter, 2 Pet. i. 19. Victorinus (century iv.) says it is the first resurrection. Many others, ancient and modern, understand Christ Himself, who, ch. xxii.

16, declares Himself to be the bright and morning star: and doubtless, as has been before remarked on the fruit of the tree of life, ver. 7, and on the hidden manna, ver. 17, in the mystical sense, Christ Himself is the sum and inclusion of all Christ's gifts: this truth serves to connect the symbolism of all these passages, but does not justify us in disturbing that of one by introducing that of another. Here the morning star clearly is not Christ Himself, the very terms of the sentence separating the two. Then again, we have Lyra's interpretation, the glorious body; Grotius's, that it is brightness as much exceeding all other, as the morning star excels the other stars. And this interpretation is probably near the mark. In Dan. xii. 3 we read that the righteous shall shine as the stars, and in Matt. xiii. 43 that they shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. And in Prov. iv. 18, we read that "the path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Still, this interpretation does not quite satisfy the words I will give him: unless indeed the poetic imagery be, that he is imagined as clad in the glory of that star, putting it on as a jewel, or as a glittering robe. De Wette supposes that the star is to be given to him as its ruler: but such an interpretation would lead into a wide field of speculation which does not seem to have been opened by Scripture, and is hardly required by the passage itself). <sup>29.</sup> See above, on ver. 7.

CHAP. III. 1—6.] THE EPISTLE TO THE CHURCH AT SARDIS. The spirit of this Epistle is one of rebuke and solemn denunciation. Even the promise, ver. 5, is tinged with the same hue. For the history, see Introduction.—And to the angel of the church in Sardis write; These things of God, and the seven stars; <sup>b</sup> I <sup>b ch. ii. 2.</sup> know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, <sup>c</sup> and art <sup>c Eph. ii. 1, 5. 1 Tim. v. 6</sup> dead. <sup>2</sup> Be watchful, and strengthen the things which remain, that were ready to die: for I have not found saith He that hath the seven spirits of God (this designation of our Lord has not before occurred: but it is new rather in form than in substance. We have mention in ch. i. 4 of the seven spirits which are before God's throne: and we there found occasion to interpret them of the plenitude of the Godhead in its attributes and energies. See, for further elucidation, ch. iv. 5, v. 6. These spirits, this plenitude, Christ, the Lord of the Church, possesses, is clothed and invested with, in all fulness. From Him the spiritual life of his churches comes as its source, in all its elements of vitality. He searches all the depths both of our depravity and of His own applications of grace. He has in his hand all the Spirit's power of conviction. He wields the fire of purification and the fire of destruction. Whether the Spirit informs, or rebukes, or warns, or comforts, or promises, whether He softens or hardens men's hearts, it is Christ who, searching the hearts as Son of God and feeling their feelings as Son of man, wields and applies the one and manifold Spirit.

The designation here has its appropriateness in the whole character of this solemn Epistle. The Lord of the Church comes, armed with all the powers of the Spirit; searching the depths of hypocrisy, judging of the worthlessness of works not done in faith. The difficulty of this general attribute of Christ, and not any one selected specially as applying to Sardis being here introduced, seems to be best accounted for, not, as Ebrard, by the general prophetic import of the Epistle, but by the fact that the minatory strain of the Epistle justifies the alleging the whole weight and majesty of the divine character of our Lord, to create alarm and bring about repentance), and the seven stars (the former symbolism [ch. i. 16, 20] still holds in all its strictness. Nor have we the least right here, as some do, to suppose that the stars and the spirits are identical. The motive mentioned above would fully account for this designation also: The Lord of all the churches: He who appoints them their ministering angels, and has them, and all that is theirs, in His hand): I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest (I need only mention for warning the childish fancy, that the Bishop of Sardis was named Zosimus or Vitalis (living). The expression explains itself: thou hast a repute that thou livest: art nomi-nally, as we commonly now say, Christian), and (the mere copula carries the contrast far more vividly and pathetically than when it is made rhetorically complete by inserting "yet") art dead (spiritually dead: void of vitality and fruitfulness: sunk in that deep deadly sleep which, if not broken in upon and roused up, is death itself: so St. Paul, Eph. v. 14). Be (literally, become: because a change is involved: become what thou art not) watchful (we can hardly help in English substituting the adjective for the participle "watching;" thereby losing objective vividness, and getting instead a subjective attribute of character. "Awake and watch" would be, in paraphrase, tantamount to the text), and strengthen the remaining things, which were (the time is transferred to that indicated by the fulfilment of the command: which were, when thou shalt apply thyself to strengthen them) about to die (there is a question whether these remaining matters are to be understood as things, matters in which the Sardian church was not yet totally without spiritual vitality, or as persons, who were not yet passed into the almost universal death-slumber of hypocrisy. The latter view is taken by very many Commentators. And there is nothing in the construction to preclude it. But if I mistake not, there is in the context. For to assume that the persons remaining could be thus described, would surely be to leave no room for those mentioned with so much praise below in ver. 4. Had the things which remain not occurred, we might have well understood "strengthen those that were ready to die," of confirming those thy weak members who on account of the general deadness were near losing their spiritual life altogether: but with the former expression, this can hardly stand. We must therefore take the other view,—“strengthen those thy remaining few graces, which in thy spiritual deadly slumber are not yet quite extinct”): for I have not found thy works complete in the sight of my God (up to the mark and measure of being acceptable to Him: i.e. not wrought in that living faith which alone renders human works acceptable to God, by uniting them to Him on whom the Father looks with perfect approval. Düsterdieck well observes, “The express reference to the absolute rule of all Christian morality is here put the more strongly and strikingly, because this church had among men a name that she lived.” The my binds on the judgment of Him who speaks to that of God). Remember [therefore] how (not subjective, “with what manner of reception,” but objective, “after what sort:” as in Eph. iv. 20; 1 Cor. xv. 11) thou hast received (perfect tense; said of the permanent deposit of doctrine entrusted) and heardest (merely past tense: said of the act of hearing, when it took place), and keep (what thou hast received and heardest: keep, as an abiding habit), and repent (the command is of a quick and decisive act of amendment). If therefore (the therefore is hardly because it is assumed, in the present evil state of the Sardian church, that the exhortation will be in vain: far rather, because repentance is so grievously needed. And it follows on the plain declaration which has been made of that present evil state; coming forcibly and unexpectedly where we should rather have looked for “But if”) thou dost not watch (shalt not have awaked and become watchful, before the time about to be indicated in the threat which is coming), I will come as a thief (these words do not here refer to our Lord's final coming, but to some signal judgment in which He would overtake the Sardian church. Just as the formula derived from the great truth of the suddenness of His second coming is frequently applied to His final judgment in Jerusalem, so is it to other His partial and special advents to judgment in the case of individuals and churches), and thou shalt not know at what hour I will come upon thee. Nevertheless (notwithstanding this state of apathy even to spiritual death) thou hast (belonging to thee as members. Notice as Bengel remarks, that these few had not separated themselves from the church in Sardis, notwithstanding its degraded state) a few names (“men who may be counted by name:” compare Acts i. 15; ch. xi. 13, note. The term would hardly be used except of a limited number) in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments (literally, did not defile: the past tense is from the standing-point of the future day presently introduced, as so commonly when life is looked back on from the great time of retribution. The meaning of the figure [which occurs also in Jude 23] has been variously given. There can be little doubt that the simpler and more general explanation is the right one: viz. who have not sullied the purity of their Christian life by falling into sin); and they shall walk with me in white (the white here is not to be identified with the undefiled garments which they now wear: it is a new and glorious hue of victory: see ch. vi. 11; vii. 9; xix. 8. drim on the priests, those who were condemned were clothed in black, while the blameless wore a white robe,—seems, like so many of these rabbinical illustrations, to be far-fetched, and to spoil the simplicity of the passage. An allusion to Zech. iii. 3 ff. is far more obvious. with me, in remarkable accord with our Lord's prayer in John xvii. 24, "Father, I will that they whom Thou hast given Me, where I am, there they also may be with me:" see also Luke xxiii. 43), for they are worthy (the worthiness here is found in the terms of the sentence itself. They have kept their garments undefiled: they of all others then are the persons who should walk in the glorious white robes of heavenly triumph. Exactly thus in ch. xvi. 5, 6, "They shed blood, and thou gavest them blood to drink: they are worthy." To dream of any merit here implied, is not only to miss, but to run counter to the sense of the whole saying and situation. The absence of defilement is only explained by ch. vii. 14, "They washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb:" and as Vitringa excellently says, "Unworthiness here marks the proportion and congruency which was between the state of grace in which they had been on earth, and of the glory which the Lord had decreed for them according to the measure of this very law of grace"). He that conquereth, he (the reading "he that conquereth thus," found in so many MSS., seems to have arisen originally in a very usual confusion of the long and short o in Greek, and then to have been retained, from not being altogether without meaning; "thus," i.e. as those first mentioned) shall be clad in white garments (the concluding promise takes the hue of what had gone before, and identifies those just spoken of with these victorious ones): and I will not wipe out his name out of the book of life (this again takes its colour from the preceding. Those who have a name that they live, and are dead, are necessarily wiped out from the book of life: only he whose name is a living name, can remain on those pages. Here again the Rabbinical expositors have gone wrong in imagining that the genealogical tables of the priests are alluded to. Far rather is the reference to the ordinary lists of citizens, or of living members of any body or society, from which the dead are struck out. Thus they whose names have been once inscribed in this book, whether by their outward admission into Christ's church in baptism, or by their becoming living members of Him by faith, if they endure to the end as His soldiers and servants, and obtain the victory, shall not, as all His mere professed members shall, have their names erased from it. The figure itself, of the book of life, is found as early as Exod. xxxii. 32 f.); and I will confess his name in the presence of my Father and in the presence of his angels (see Matt. x. 32; Luke xii. 8, both of which are here combined: see also Luke ix. 26; Mark viii. 38. The promise implies that in the great day the Judge will expressly acknowledge the name thus written in the book of life, as belonging to one of His. See ch. xx. 15, xxi. 27; also Matt. vii. 23, [xxv. 12], where He repudiates those whom He knows not). <sup>6.</sup> See above, ch. i. 7.

ing there. For the history, &c., see Introduction). And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write; These things saith the holy One (as opposed to the synagogue of Satan below; not with reference to Christ's High-priesthood, but expressive of moral attribute), the true One (this title would appear as if it were chosen to declare an attribute of our Lord, opposed to "those who say . . . and are not, but do lie" below), he that hath the key of David (i. e. He that is the Heir and Lord of the abiding theocracy. In Isa. xxii. 22, it is said of Eliakim son of Hilkiah, "The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open:" which is manifestly the passage here incorporated into the Lord's message; and the sense is that whatever inferior degrees there may be of this power of opening and shutting the church [the house of David, with reference to the false Jews below], the supreme power, the one true key, belongs to the Lord Christ alone. It is hardly justified, and serves but little purpose, to attempt to set up a distinction between "the key of David" here, and "the key of the house of David" in Isaiah. The key is the same in both cases: but the One possesses it as his own by right, the other has it merely entrusted to him; laid on his shoulder. See on the whole sense, Matt. xvi. 19), who openeth, and no one shall shut; and shutteth, and no one shall open (these words are to be taken not merely of the power of Christ to forgive sins, but generally, as indeed the next ver. requires. Christ only has power to admit into and exclude from His kingdom; to enlarge the work and opportunities of His church, and to contract them); I know thy works are words of comfort and support to the Philadelphian church): behold, I have given before thee a door opened (i. e. have granted, in my possession and administration of the key of David, that a door should stand opened. The door is variously understood: but most Expositors take it to mean, as in 1 Cor. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. ii. 12; Col. iv. 3 [otherwise in Acts xiv. 27], an opportunity for the mission work of the church. And this appears to be the true sense here, by what follows in ver. 9, promising conversion of those who were now foes.

before thee, because the course is naturally forward), which no one is able to shut: because (gives the reason of what preceded; the Lord will confer this great advantage on the Philadelphian church, because . . .) thou hast little power (not as A. V. "a little strength," thereby virtually reversing the sense of the words: the original importing "thy strength is but small," and the A. V. importing "thou hast some strength," the fact of its smallness vanishing under the indefinite term "a little." This smallness of strength must not be attributed to a scanty bestowal of miraculous powers on the Philadelphian church, but to the fact of the fewness of the congregation of Christians there: possibly also to their poverty as contrasted with the wealth of their Jewish adversaries), and (using that little well) didst keep my word, and didst not deny my name (the past tenses perhaps refer to some time of especial trial when both these temptations, to break Christ's word and deny His name, were put before the church). Behold. I give (not, to thee, nor can we render it by I will make, as the A. V.: the sense is broken off in the following clause, and the verb give resumed by I will make them) of the synagogue of Satan (see on ch. ii. 9, where the same expression occurs of outward Jews who were not real Jews), who profess themselves to be Jews and they are not, but do lie,—behold, I will make them that they shall come, and shall worship before thy feet (so in Isa. lx. 14, “The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee: and all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet: and they shall call thee the city of the Lord, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel.” See also Isa. xlix. 23; Zech. viii. 20—23), and that they may know that I loved thee (the English idiom requires, “have loved thee:” but the past tense has its propriety, referring as it does to the time preceding that in which they shall do this. Dusterdieck takes it as used of that great proof which Christ gave of His love by dying for His church, appealing to the same tense in Eph. v. 25; Gal. ii. 20; 1 John iv. 10, 11. But thus we lose the especial reference to the particular church which seems to be involved in the recognition. It is the love bestowed on the Philadelphian church, in signaling its success in the work of Christ, that these converted enemies shall recognize). Because thou didst keep the word of my endurance (or, patience: the word preached to thee, enjoining that endurance which belongs to Me and mine, see ch. i. 9), I also (I on my side: the also expressing reciprocity) will keep thee (thee, emphatic and prominent) from (from out of the midst of: but whether by immunity from, or by being brought safe through, the preposition does not clearly define) the hour of temptation (the appointed season of sore trial: literally, of the temptation, of the well-known and signal temptation. But the article cannot be expressed in English, because it would unavoidably become the antecedent to “which” following) which is about to come upon the whole world (the time imported is that prophesied of in Matt. xxiv. 21 ff., viz. the great time of trouble which shall be before the Lord’s second coming. As such, it is immediately connected with I come quickly following), to try them that dwell upon the earth (see ch. viii. 13, &c., where the expression applies to those who are not of the church of Christ. In this great trial, the servants of Christ shall be kept safe, ch. vii. 3. The trial of the temptation will operate in two ways: on the faithful, by bringing out their fidelity; on the unfaithful and unbelieving, by hardening them in their impenitence, see ch. ix. 20, 21, xvi. 11, 21. The Expositors have in many cases gone away from this broad and obvious meaning here, and have sought to identify the hour of temptation with various periods of trial and persecution of the Church: a line of interpretation carrying its own refutation with it in the very terms used in the text. Thus Grotius understands it of the persecution under Nero; Lyra, of the future increase of that under Domitian, which was raging as the Apostle wrote: others, of those under Trajan; others again, of the troubles which should arise on account of Antichrist, which is nearer the mark). 11.] I come quickly (these words, which in different senses and with varying references form the burden of this whole book, are here manifestly to be taken as an encouragement and comfort to the Philadelphian church, arising from the nearness of the Lord's coming to reward her; compare thy crown below): hold fast that which thou hast (this, in the language of these Epistles, imports any advantage, or progress in grace, already possessed; compare ch. ii. 6, "This thou hast, that" . . . This is regarded as a treasure, to be firmly grasped, as against those who are ever ready to snatch it away. In this case it was a rich treasure indeed: compare vv. 8, 10), that no one take (snatch away: but here the figure stops: it is not for himself that the robber would snatch it, but merely to deprive the possessor. So we have, to "take peace out of the earth," ch. vi. 4) thy crown. <sup>12.</sup>] The reward of the conqueror. He that conquereth, I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God (i. e. he shall have a fixed and important place in the glorified church hereafter. That this, and nothing referring to any honour or dignity in the church militant, or in that as leading on to the church triumphant is intended, is manifest from the whole diction of this passage, as well as from comparing the corresponding promises, which all refer to the blessings of the future state of glory. It is no objection to this view, that in the heavenly Jerusalem there is no temple, ch. xxi. 22: but rather a corroboration of it. That glorious city is all temple, and Christ's victorious ones are its living stones and pillars. Thus as Düsterdieck well remarks, the imagery of the church militant, 1 Cor. iii. 16 ff.; Eph. ii. 19 ff.; 1 Pet. ii. 5 ff., is transferred to the church triumphant, but with this difference, that the saints are no longer the stones merely, but now the pillars themselves, standing in their immovable firmness. On my God, see note on ch. ii. 7), and out of it he shall never more go out (the subject is not the pillar, but he that conquereth; and the sense, that he who is thus fixed in his eternal place as a pillar in the heavenly temple, will never more, from any cause, depart from it. Those Commentators who have understood the promise of the church militant, have been obliged to take the going out as passive, shall not be cast out. Lyra takes it in both senses—"neither by apostasy, nor by excommunication." And thus except that the latter word will have no place, we may well understand the general term here used: none shall thrust him out, nor shall he be any more in danger of falling, and thus thrusting himself out. It is well worth noticing the recorded fact, that Philadelphia was notorious for calamities by earthquake. The language in which Strabo describes this is remarkable in connexion with this promise of the pillar which should not be moved: "Philadelphia cannot trust to its walls, but day by day they are more or less shaken and crack. And the inhabitants always take into account these accidents of their land, and build with reference to its character." And still more so in another place: "The city of Philadelphia is full of earthquakes; the walls are constantly cracking, and some part or other of the city is always in trouble, wherefore the inhabitants are scanty." Tacitus tells us, that in the reign of Tiberius, when the twelve cities of proconsular Asia were overthrown by an earthquake, Philadelphia suffered, and was in consequence excused its taxes, and in common with the others entrusted to a senatorian commissioner to repair); and I will write upon him (the conqueror; not the pillar) the name of my God (some think of the mitre breastplate of the high priests, on which was inscribed "Holiness to the Lord," Exod. xxviii. 36. But this does not seem applicable here, where, from this and the following particulars, it is rather a blessed belonging to God and the holy city and Christ, that is imported, than the priestly office of the glorified Christian), and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which descendeth out of heaven from my God (on the whole, see ch. xxi. 2, 3, and notes. It is possible, that the name Jehovah Shammah, Ezek. xlviii. 35, may be meant; but hardly probable, seeing that the Holy Name itself has before been mentioned as inscribed on him. The inscription of the name of the city would betoken citizenship),—and mine own new name (not the name mentioned ch. xix. 16, which is known and patent, but that indicated ch. xix. 12, “which none knoweth but Himself:” for this is clearly pointed at by the word new. <sup>14—22.</sup> THE EPISTLE TO THE CHURCH IN LAODICEA. And to the angel (not, the bishop or ruler, see on ch. i. 20) of the church in Laodicea write; These things saith the Amen (see Isaiah. Christ is the Amen, inasmuch as His words shall never pass away, but shall find certain ratification. This, and not the particular case which is treated in 2 Cor. i. 20, seems to be the reference here, where not the ratification of promises merely, but general fidelity and certainty are concerned: as Arethas says, “This is the same as these things saith the true One: for Amen means yea. There is then yea in all things said of Him; i.e. all is truth, and none a lie”), the faithful and true witness (there does not seem in this title to be any allusion to the prophecies which are about to follow in ch. iv. ff. as some have imagined. Far rather does it substantiate the witness borne in the Epistle itself, as we have seen in the case of the other introductions), the beginning of the creation of God (see Col. i. 15, and note. In Him the whole creation of God is begun and conditioned: He is its source and primary fountain-head. The mere word beginning would admit the meaning that Christ is the first-created being: see Gen. xlix. 3; Deut. xxi. 17; and Prov. viii. 22. And so the Arians here take it, and some who have followed them. But every consideration of the requirements of the context, and of the Person of Christ as set forth to us in this book, is against any such view. Düsterdieck asks the questions, “How could Christ write it if it were only this present Epistle, if He were himself a creature? How could every creature in heaven and earth adore Him, if He were one of themselves [ch. xix. 10]? We need only think of the appellation of our Lord as the Alpha and Omega [ch. xxii. 13: compare i. 8] in its necessary fulness of import, and we shall see that in the Alpha lies the necessity of His being the beginning of the Creation, as in the Omega that of His coming to bring the visible creation to an end”): I know thy works, that (see above, ver. 1, where the construction is the same: I have thy whole course of life before me, and its testimony is, that . . . ) thou art neither cold nor hot (the peculiar use of the similitude of physical cold and heat here, makes it necessary to interpret the former of the two somewhat differently to its common acceptation: so that while hot [compare Rom. xii. 11] keeps its meaning of fervent, warm and earnest in the life of faith and love, cold cannot here mean “dead and cold,” as we say of the listless and careless professor of religion: for this is just what these Laodiceans were, and what is expressed by the word rendered lukewarm below. So that we must, so to speak, go further into coldness for the meaning of cold, and take it as signifying, not only entirely without the spark of spiritual life, but also and chiefly, by consequence, openly belonging to the world without, and having no part nor lot in Christ’s church, and actively opposed to it. This, as well as the opposite state of spiritual fervour, would be an intelligible and plainly-marked condition: at all events, free from that danger of mixed motive and disregarded principle which belongs to the lukewarm state: inasmuch as a man in earnest, be he right or wrong, is ever a better man than one professing what he does not feel. This necessity of interpretation here has been much and properly pressed by some of the later Commentators, but was by the older ones very generally missed, and the coldness interpreted of the mere negative absence of spiritual life): would that thou wert cold or hot: so (expresses the actual relation of facts to the wish just expressed, as not fulfilling it: “seeing that this is not so”) because thou art lukewarm, and neither hot nor cold, I shall soon spue thee out of my mouth (it being the known effect of the taking of lukewarm water, to produce vomiting. I shall soon is a mild expression, carrying with it a possibility of the determination being changed, dependently on a change in the state of the church).

lukewarmness is further expanded, as inducing miserable unconsciousness of defect and need, and empty self-sufficiency. And the charge comes in the form of solemn and affectionate counsel. Because (forms the reason of I advise below: seeing that) thou sayest [that] I am rich, and am become wealthy, and have need in nothing (the three expressions form a climax: the first giving the act of being rich, the second the process of having become so [in which there is not merely outward fact, but some self-laudation: see Hosea xii. 8], the third the result, self-sufficiency. From the whole context it is evident that not, as many have imagined, outward worldly wealth, but imagined spiritual riches, are in question. The imagined spiritual self-sufficiency was doubtless the natural growth of an outwardly prosperous condition: but the great self-deceit of which the Lord here complains was not concerning worldly wealth, which was a patent fact, but concerning spiritual, which was a baseless fiction), and knowest not that thou (emphatic; “thou, of all others;” corresponding to the use of the articles below) art the wretched and the pitiable one (in both cases, as distinguished above others, as the person to whom above all others the epithets belong. And these epithets are especially opposed to the idea that there was no want of any thing), and poor and blind and naked (observe, the counsel which follows takes up these three points in order, thereby bringing them out as distinct from and not subordinate to the two preceding), I advise thee (there is a deep irony in this word. One who has need of nothing, yet needs counsel on the vital points of self-preservation) to buy (at the cost only of thy good self-opinion.

That a pauper should be advised to buy gold and raiment, and ointment, might of itself shew what kind of buying is meant, even if Isa. lv. 1, "Nay, without money and without price," had not clearly defined it. Yet notwithstanding such clear warning not to go wrong, the Roman-Catholic expositors have here again handled the word of God deceitfully, and explained, as Lyra, "Buy, i.e. with good works;" Cornelius-a-lapide, "The word buy signifies that a man must do many things and contribute many things in order to be fit to receive these gifts from God." The term, in fact, continues the irony. "All this lofty self-sufficiency must be expended in the labour of getting from Me these absolute necessities." So most of the later expositors. So even the Roman-Catholic Stern, but disguising the truth under an appearance of some price being given: "What is the price? Has not the Lord Himself said that she is poor and pitiable and naked and wretched? She must give up her heart to Christ, her feelings, thoughts, and active work; must entirely give up herself to the Lord for His own possession, Matt. xiii. 45, 46") gold from me (who am the source of all true spiritual wealth, Eph. iii. 8) [fresh] burnt from the fire (the from gives the sense of being just fresh from the burning or smelting, and thus not only tried by the process, but bright and new from the furnace. This is better than, with many Commentators, to make the from almost equivalent to by, signifying the source from which the burning comes. In the interpretation, this gold represents all spiritual wealth, in its sterling reality, as contrasted with that merely imaginary sort on which the Laodiceans prided themselves. It is narrowing it too much to interpret it as charity, or faith, or indeed any one spiritual grace, as distinguished from the sum total of them all), that thou mayest be (literally, mayest have become, viz., by the purchase) rich; and white gar- ments (Düsterdieck rightly remarks that the white garments are distinct from the gold only in being a different image in the form of expression, not really in the thing signified. On the meaning, see ver. 4, ch. vii. 14, xix. 8. The lack of righteousness, which can be only bought from Christ, and that at the price of all fancied righteousness of our own, is just as much a poverty as the other), that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness be not made manifest (the choice of the word seems as if some particular time were in view when such manifestation would take place. If we are to assign one, it will naturally be that of the Lord's coming, when "we must all be made manifest before the judgment-seat of Christ," 2 Cor. v. 10: when the Lord of the Church will come to see his guests, and all not clad in the wedding robe will be cast out, Matt. xxii. 11 ff.); and collyrium (eye-salve; the use of which is apparent from what follows. The collyrium was so called from its shape, being a stick or roll of ointment for the eyes, in the shape of a bread-cake) to anoint thine eyes, that thou mayest see (in the spiritual interpretation, this collyrium will import the anointing of the Holy Spirit, which, like the gold of His unsearchable riches, and the white garment of His righteousness, is to be obtained from Him, John xvi. 7, 14; Acts ii. 33; and also at the price of the surrender of our own fancied wisdom. The analogy of 1 John ii. 20, 27 is not to be overlooked: see notes at those places).

19.] Importing that these rich proofs of Christ's love are only to be sought by such as the Laodiceans in the way of rebuke and chastisement: and reciprocally, as tending not to despair, but to encouragement, that rebuke and chastisement are no signs of rejection from Christ, but of His abiding and pleading love, even to the lukewarm and careless. I (emphatically prefixed: I, for my part:

it is one of My ways, which are unlike men's ways), as many as I love (not, as Grotius, "meaning those whom I have determined only not to cast out and abjure;" but in its fullest and most blessed sense. Nor is the assertion addressed only to the better portion of the church, but to all, as a gracious call to repentance; as is evident from the words next following), I rebuke and chasten (the rebuking, the convicting of sin, producing conviction, is a portion of the Lord's chastening: the latter may extend very much wider than the former, even to judgments and personal infliction, which, however they may subserve the purpose of convicting, are not, properly speaking, part of it. "Rebuke pertains to words, chastisement to stripes." Anshert); be zealous then (in thy habit of Christian life), and repent (begin that life of zeal by an act, decisive and effective, of change of purpose. Change of purpose must, in the fact, precede zeal, which is the effectual working in a man's life of that change of purpose). <sup>20.</sup>] Behold, I stand at the door, and knock (the reference to Sol. Song, v. 2, is too plain to be for a moment doubted: and if so, the interpretation must be grounded in that conjugal relation between Christ and the church,—Christ and the soul,—of which that mysterious book is expressive. This being granted, we may well say, that the vivid depiction of Christ standing at the door is introduced, to bring home to the lukewarm and careless church the truth of His constant presence, which she was so deeply forgetting. His knocking was taking place partly by the utterance of these very rebukes, partly by every interference in judgment and in mercy. Whenever His hand is heard, He is knocking at the door. But it is not His hand only that may be heard: see below): if any man hear my voice (here we have more than the mere sound of his knock: He speaks. See Acts xii. 13 f., "As Peter knocked at the door" . . . "when she knew Peter's voice."—In that case we must conceive

Rhoda to have asked, "Who is there?" and Peter to have answered. It may not be uninteresting to fill up this connexion in a similar manner. "It is I," is an answer the soul may often hear, if it will enquire the reason of an unexpected knock at the door of its slumbers; or we may compare Sol. Song, v. 2, "It is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me"), and open the door (literally, "shall have heard," "shall have opened;" but it would be pedantry thus to render in our language. On the sense, see Sol. Song, v. 6.

Our verse is a striking and decisive testimony to the practical freedom of our will to receive or reject the heavenly Guest: without the recognition of which, the love and tenderness of the saying become a hideous mockery.

We then open the door to Christ, when we admit Him, His voice, His commands, His example, to a share in our inner counsels and sources of action. To say that this can be done without His grace, is ignorance: to say it is done only by that grace irresistibly exerted, is far worse,—it is, to deprive His gracious pleadings of all meaning), I will enter in to him, and I will sup with him, and he with me (the imagery is taken from the usages of intimate hospitality. But whereas in these it would be merely the guest who would sup with the host who lets him in, here the guest becomes himself the host, because He is the bread of life, and the Giver of the great feast of fat things and of the great marriage supper [Matt. viii. 11, xxv. 1 ff.; Rev. xix. 7, 9]. St. John is especially fond of reporting these sayings of reciprocity which our Lord uttered; compare John vi. 56 [x. 38], xiv. 20, xv. 4, 5, xvii. 21, 26. This blessed admission of Christ into our hearts will lead to His becoming our guest, ever present with us and sharing in all our blessings—and, which is even more, to our being ever in close union with Him, partaking ever of His fulness, until we sit down at His table in His Kingdom).—He that conquereth (see above, ch. ii. 26, and ver. 12, for the construction), I will give to him to sit (in the blessed life of glory hereafter: such promises cannot be regarded, as this by some, as partially fulfilled in this life: for thus the following analogy, "as I also, &c." would fail) with me (compare John xvii. 24) on my throne (have a share in My kingly power, as ch. ii. 27, xx. 6), as I also conquered, and sat down with my Father on His throne (the past tenses refer to the historical facts of the Resurrection and Ascension. By the latter, Christ sat down at the right hand of God, or of the throne of God, as Heb. xii. 2. No distinction must be made between the throne of the Father, on which Christ sits, and that of Christ, on which the victorious believer is to sit with Him: they are one and the same, called "the throne of God and the Lamb," ch. xxii. 1; and the glory of the redeemed will be a participation in that of the Father and the Son, John xvii. 22).—Doubtless the occurrence of this, the highest and most glorious of all the promises, in this place, is to be explained not entirely from any especial aptness to the circumstances of the Laodicean church, though such has been attempted to be assigned [e. g. by Ebrard—because the victory over lukewarmness would be so much more difficult than that in any other case], but also from the fact of its occurring at the end of all the Epistles, and as it were gathering them all into one. It must not be forgotten too, that the words, I sat down with my Father on His throne, form a link to the next part of the book, where we soon, ch. v. 5, 6, read, And I saw in the midst of the throne . . . a Lamb standing, as it were slain. <sup>22.</sup>] See on ch. ii. 7.

From this point begins the Revelation proper, extending to the end of the book. And herein we have a first great portion, embracing chapp. iv.—xi., the opening of the seals and the sounding of the trumpets.

But preparatory to both these series of revelations, we have described to us in chapp. iv. v., the heavenly scenery which furnishes the local ground for these visions. Of these, ch. iv. is properly the scene itself: ch. v. being a further unfolding of its details with a view to the vision of the seals which is to follow. So that we have,—

CH. IV. 1—11.] THE VISION OF GOD'S PRESENCE IN HEAVEN. "Decrees respecting the fortunes of the future rest with God, and from Him comes the revelation of them through Jesus Christ. Hence the Revelation begins with the imparting to the Apostle, through Christ, of the vision of God's presence." De Wette.

1.] After these things (or, "after this,"—is a formula frequently occurring in this book, and nowhere indicating a break in the ecstatic state of the Seer, but only the succession of separate visions. Those are mistaken, e. g. Bengel, Hengstenberg, who imagine an interval, here and in the other places, during which the Seer wrote down that which had been previously revealed to him. The whole is conceived as imparted in one continuous revelation consisting of many parts. See below on ver. 2) I saw (not with the bodily eye, but with the eye of ecstatic vision, as throughout the book. He is throughout in the Spirit. It is not I looked, as in A. V.: not the directing of the Seer's attention which discovers the door to him, but the simple reception of the vision which is recorded), and, behold, a door set open (not, was opened, as A. V., which gives the idea that the Seer witnessed the act of opening. For the same reason the word "opened" is objectionable, as it may be mistaken for the past tense of the neuter verb to open) in heaven (notice the difference between this vision and that in Ezek. i. 1; Matt. iii. 16; Acts vii. 56, x. 11. In those, the heaven itself parts asunder, and discloses the vision to those below on earth: here the heaven, the house or palace of God [Ps. xi. 4, xviii. 6, xxix. 9], remains firmly shut to those on earth, but a door is opened, and the Seer is rapt in the Spirit through it. Henceforth usually he looks from the heaven down on the earth, seeing however both alike, and being present in either, as the localities of his various visions require): and the former voice (much confusion has been introduced here by rendering, as A. V., "the first voice which," &c., giving the idea that it means, first after the door was seen set open; whereas it is the voice which I heard at first, viz. in ch. i. 10) which I heard (at the beginning) as of a trumpet speaking with me (viz. ch. i. 10. This clause is not predicative, "was as . . ." as A. V. and Treg. The construction simply is—"behold, a door . . . and the voice . . ." both clauses being dependent on "behold."—The voice is not that of Christ, but of some undefined heavenly being or angel. As Düsterdieck observes, all we can say of it is that it is the same voice as that in ch. i. 10, which there, ver. 17, is followed by that of our Lord, not "as of a trumpet," but "as of many waters," as stated by anticipation in ver. 15), saying, Come up hither (viz. through the opened door), and I will shew thee (it is surprising how Stier can allege this I will shew thee as a proof that the Lord Himself only can be speaking: compare ch. xxi. 9, 10, xxii. 8, 9, which latter place is decisive against him) the things which must (of prophetic necessity) take place after these things (so literally: viz., the things now present: as in ch. i. 19, but the things not being the same in the two cases. So that after these things has very much the general meaning given by the "hereafter" of the A. V.: this clause corresponds to "which are about to happen after these things" of ch. i. 19).

2.] Immediately I was (became) in the Spirit (i. e. I experienced a new accession of the Spirit's powerful influence, which transported me thither: "I was in a trance of ecstasy:" see on ch. i. 10. It is hardly credible that any scholar should have proposed to understand "there" after was, "immediately I was there in the Spirit?" but this was done by Zullig, and has found an advocate in England in Dr. Maitland): and, behold, a throne stood (the A. V. "was set," gives too much the idea that the placing of the throne formed part of the vision: "lay" would be our best word, but we do not use it of any thing so lofty as a throne. I have therefore adopted was there, as best, indicating mere position) in heaven, and upon the throne one sitting (called henceforward throughout the book, He that sitteth upon the throne, and being the Eternal Father [not as Lyra, the Three-One God; for He that sitteth on the throne is distinguished in ch. vi. 16, vii. 10 from the Son, and in ver. 5 from the Holy Spirit]: see ch. vii. 10, xix. 4, where we read expressly "to God that sitteth upon the throne." So that it is not for the reasons sometimes suggested, that the Name is not expressed: e. g. on account of the Jewish unwillingness to express the sacred Name: or, that the mind has no figure and the tongue no word by which to express it. The simple reason seems to be, as assigned by Hengstenberg and Düsterdieck, that St. John would describe simply that which he saw, as he saw it. For the same reason he does not name Christ expressly in the first vision, ch. i. 13): and he that sat (no need to supply "was:" the nominatives are all correlative after behold) like in appearance (lit. "in vision," "in sight," as A. V. in the next clause) to a jasper and sardine stone (the jasper appears to have been a beautiful

stone of various wavy colours, semi-opaque, granulous in texture, used in ancient times for gems and ornaments, but in more modern ones on a larger scale for pavements and tables. The altar in Canterbury Cathedral stands on a platform of yellow jasper pavement, 30 feet by 14 feet. The sardine is a red stone, commonly supposed to answer to our cornelian. But Epiphanius, in his treatise on the twelve stones in Aaron's breastplate, says of it, that it is a Babylonian stone, blood red in colour, like the gleam of the sardine fish when pickled, and semi-opaque. Several of the Commentators have said much on the symbolic significance of these stones as representing the glory of God. Thus much only seems, in the great uncertainty and variety of views, to stand firm for us: that if the jasper is to be taken as in ch. xxi. 11, as, by the reference there to the glory of God it certainly seems it must, then it represents a watery crystalline brightness, whereas the sardine is on all hands acknowledged to be fiery red. Thus we shall have ample material for symbolic meaning: whether, as some take it, of the one great judgment by water [or of baptism], and the other by fire,—as others, of the goodness of God in nature [jasper being taken as green] and His severity in judgment,—as Ansbart, of the divinity and humanity [because His humanity at the time of His passion was tinged with blood], &c., or as the moderns mostly, of the holiness of God and His justice. This last seems to me the more probable, especially as the same mixture of white light with fire seems to pervade the Old Testament and Apocalyptic visions of the divine majesty. Compare Ezek. i. 4, viii. 2; Dan. vii. 9: and our ch. i. 14, x. 1. But nothing can be confidently asserted, in our ignorance of the precise import of the jasper): and a rain-bow (Gen. ix. 12—17; Ezek. i. 28) round about the throne (i. e. in all probability, surrounding the throne vertically, as a nimbus; not horizontally), like to the appearance of an emerald (on this name, in Greek "smaragdus," all seem agreed, that it represents the stone so well known among us as the emerald, of a lovely green colour. Almost all the Commentators think of the gracious and federal character of the bow of God, Gen. ix. 12—17. Nor is it any objection to this that the bow or glory here is green, instead of prismatic: the form is that of the covenant bow, the colour even more refreshing and more directly symbolizing grace and mercy. So far at least we may be sure of as to the symbolism of this appearance of Him that sitteth on the throne: that the brightness of His glory and fire of His judgment is ever girded by, and found within, the refreshment and surety of His mercy and goodness. So that, as Düsterdieck says well, "This fundamental vision contains all that may serve for terror to the enemies, and consolation to the friends, of Him that sitteth on the throne...").

4.] The assessors of the enthroned One.—The construction after behold still continues. And round the throne twenty-four thrones (i. e.) evidently smaller thrones, and probably lower than the throne): and upon the twenty-four thrones, elders sitting, clothed in white garments; and on their heads golden crowns (these twenty-four elders are not angels, as maintained by some, as is shewn [not by ch. v. 9, as generally argued, even by Elliott, vol. i. p. 81 f.: see text there: but] by their white robes and crowns, the rewards of endurance, ch. iii. 5, ii. 10,—but representatives of the Church, as generally understood. But if so, what sort of representatives, and why twenty-four in number? This has been variously answered. The usual understanding has been that of our earliest Commentator, Victorinus; who says, "twelve Apostles, and as many Patriarchs." And this is in all probability right in the main: the key to the interpretation being the analogy with the sayings of our Lord to the Apostles, Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30. That those sayings do not regard the same session as this, is no argument against the inference from analogy. The Abbot Joachim brings against this view that the twelve patriarchs were not personally holy men, and never are held up as distinguished in the Old Testament. But this obviously is no valid objection. It is not the personal characters, but the symbolical, that are here in question. It might be said with equal justice that the number of the actual Apostles is not definitely twelve. It is no small confirmation of the view, that in ch. xv. 3, we find the double idea of the church, as made up of Old Testament and New Testament saints, plainly revealed to St. John; for he heard the victorious saints sing the song of Moses, and the song of the Lamb. See also ch. xxi. 12, 14, where the twelve gates of the New Jerusalem are inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes, and its twelve foundations with those of the twelve Apostles. Various other interpretations are given in my Greek Test.).

5.] And out of the throne go forth (the tense is changed, and the narrative assumes the direct form, which, however, is immediately dropped again, and the accumulation of details resumed) lightnings and voices and thunders (the imagery seems to be in analogy with that in the Old Testament, where God's presence to give his law was thus accompanied: Exod. xix. 16; where lightnings and voices occur in juxtaposition as here. If this idea be correct, then we have here represented the sovereignty and almightiness of God): and seven lamps of fire burning before the throne [itself], which are the seven Spirits of God (see notes on ch. i. 4, v. 6. These seem to represent the Holy Spirit in his sevenfold working: in his enlightening and cheering as well as his purifying and consuming agency. So most Commentators. De Wette and Ebrard regard the representation as that of the Holy Spirit, the principle of physical and spiritual life, which appears only wrong by being too limited. Hengstenberg is quite beside the mark in confidently [as usual] confining the interpretation of the lamps of fire to the consuming power of the Spirit in judgment. The fact of the parallel ch. v. 6 speaking of seven eyes, and such texts as ch. xxi. 23; Ps. cxix. 105, should have kept him from this mistake. The whole of this glorious vision is of a composite and twofold nature: comfort is mingled with terror, the fire of love with the fire of judgment): and before the throne as it were a sea of glass (not, "glassy," as rendered by Elliott: the word describes not the appearance, but the material, of the sea: it appeared like a sea of glass—so clear, and so calm) like to crystal (and that not common glass, which among the ancients was, as we see from its remains, cloudy and semi-opaque, but like rock crystal for transparency and beauty, as Victorinus, "clear water, steady, unruffled by the wind." Compare by way of contrast her that sitteth on the many waters, the multitudinous and turbulent waters, ch. xvii. 1.—In seeking the explanation of this, we must first track the image from its Old Test. earlier usage. There, in Exod. xxiv. 10, we have in the Septuagint version, "And they saw the place where the God of Israel stood: and that which was under His feet was as it were work of sapphire bricks, and as the appearance of the firmament of heaven in its purity." Compare with this Ezek. i. 22, "And the likeness over the heads of the living beings themselves was as it were a firmament, stretched out over their wings above." In Job xxxvii. 18 also, the sky is said to be "as a molten looking-glass." If we are to follow these indices, the primary reference will be to the clear ether in which the throne of God is upborne: and the intent of setting this space in front of the throne will be, to betoken its separation and insulation from the place where the Seer stood, and indeed from all else around it. The material and appearance of this pavement of the throne seem chosen to indicate majestic repose and ethereal purity. All kinds of symbolic interpretations, more or less fanciful, have been given. See some of them specified in my Greek Testament). And in the midst of the throne (not, as Hengstenberg, under the throne: their movements are free, see ch. xv. 7. See below), and round about the throne (i.e. so that in the Apostle's view they partly hid the throne, partly overlapped the throne, being symmetrically arranged with regard to it, i.e., as the number necessitates, one in the midst of each side), four living beings (the A. V., "beasts," is the most unfortunate word that could be imagined. A far better one is that now generally adopted, "living-creatures:" the only objection to it being that when we come to vv. 9, 11, we give the idea, in conjoining "living-creatures" and "created," of a close relation which is not found in the Greek. I have therefore preferred living-beings, or, beings, which gives the same idea) full of eyes before and behind (this, from their respective positions, could be seen by St. John; their faces being naturally towards the throne. On the symbolism, see below). And the first living-being like to a lion, and the second living-being like to a steer (the Greek word is not necessarily to be pressed to its proper primary meaning, as indicating the young calf in distinction from the grown bullock: the Septuagint use † for an ox generally), and the third living-being having its face as of a man (or, the face of a man), and the fourth living-being like to a flying eagle. And the four living-beings, each of them having six wings apiece. All round and within (I prefer much putting a period at apiece, to carrying on the construction; as more in accord with the general style of this description.

Understand, after both around, and within,—their wings: the object of St. John being to shew, that the six wings in each case did not interfere with that which he had before declared, viz. that they were full of eyes before and behind. Round the outside of each wing, and up the inside of each [half-expanded] wing, and of the part of the body also which was in that inside recess) they are full of eyes: and they have no rest by day and by night (these words may belong either to "have no rest," or to "saying." I prefer joining it with the latter), saying, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty (so far is identical with the seraphim's ascription of praise in Isa. vi. 3: Almighty answering usually in the Septuagint to Subaoth, though not in that place), which was, and which is, and which is to come (see on ch. i. 8). in the main identical with the cherubim of the Old Test. [compare Ezek. i. 5—10, x. 20], which are called by the same name of living-creatures, and are similarly described. We may trace however some differences. In Ezekiel's vision, each living-being has all four faces, Ez. i. 6, whereas here the four belong severally, one to each. Again in Ezekiel's vision, it is apparently the wheels which are full of eyes, Ezek. i. 18; though in ch. x. 12, it would appear as if the animals also were included. Again, the having six wings apiece is not found in the cherubim of Ezekiel, which have four, Ezek. i. 6,—but belongs to the seraphim described in Isa. vi. 2, to whom also [see above] belongs the ascription of praise here given. So that these are forms compounded out of the most significant particulars of more than one Old Test. vision.

In enquiring after their symbolic import, we are met by the most remarkable diversity of interpretation. 1) Our earliest Commentator, Victorinus, may serve as the type of those who have understood them to symbolize the Four Evangelists, or rather, Gospels:—"The animal like a lion is the Gospel according to Mark, in which the voice of a lion roaring in the desert is heard, the voice of one crying in the desert, Prepare ye the way of the Lord. Under the figure of a man, Matthew strives to announce to us the generation of Mary from whom Christ received flesh. So while he enumerates from Abraham to David and Joseph, he has spoken as of a man. Therefore his preaching shews the effigy of a man. Luke, while he tells of the priesthood of Zacharias offering a victim for the people, and the angel appearing to him,—on account of the priesthood, and the description of the victim, is represented by an ox. And the Evangelist John, like an eagle, taking wing and hastening up to loftier things, treats of the Word of God." I have cited this comment at length, to shew on what fanciful and untenable ground it rests. For with perhaps the one exception of the last of the four, not one of the Evangelists has any inner or substantial accordance with the character thus assigned. Consequently these characteristics are found varied, and that in the earliest writer in whom the view can be traced, viz. Irenæus, who makes the lion to be the gospel of St. John; the steer that of St. Luke, as above; the man, that of St. Matthew; the eagle, that of St. Mark. So also Andreas. But again Augustine attributes the lion to St. Matthew, the man to St. Mark, the steer to St. Luke, and the eagle to St. John. These notices may again serve to shew with what uncertainty the whole view is beset. It has nevertheless been adopted by Jerome, Primasius, Bede, and many others of old, and among the moderns by Williams [on the Study of the Gospels, pp. 1—92], Scott [Interpretation of the Apocalypse, p. 132, but making, as Augustine above, the lion, St. Matthew; the man, St. Mark; the ox, St. Luke; and the eagle, St. John], Wordsworth [Lectures on the Apocalypse, p. 116, who, as in his statements on the other details, so here, ascribes unanimity [see below!] to the ancients: "in them the ancient church beheld a figure of the four gospels," suppressing also the fact of discrepancies in the application to the individual gospels], &c. The principal of the other interpretations prevalent among the ancients and moderns have been: 2) the 4 elements: 3) the 4 cardinal virtues: 4) the 4 faculties and powers of the human soul: 5) Our Lord in the four-fold great events of Redemption: 6) the 4 patriarchal-churches: the lion being Jerusalem, for its constancy; the ox, Antioch, for its obedience; the man, Alexandria, for its human learning; the eagle, Constantinople, for having produced the men of most elevated contemplation: and Cornelius-a-lapide, who adopts this, interprets the throne of God to be "the see of Rome, in which sits the lion of God:" 7) the 4 great Apostles, Peter, fervent as the lion: James the Lord's brother, patient as the ox: Matthew, good as the man: Paul, always flying about as the eagle: 8) all the doctors of the church: 9) four orders of churchmen, pastors, deacons, doctors, contemplatives: 10) the 4 representatives of the New Test. church, as the four standards of the tribes Reuben, Judah, Ephraim, and Dan, which are traditionally thus reported [see also Num. ii.], were of the Old Test. church: 11) the 4 virtues of the Apostles, magnanimity, beneficence, equity, wisdom: 12) the 4 principal angels: 13) the angelic, or equal-to-angelic, state of the glorified church: so Elliott, vol. i. p. 87. But thus we have no account given of the peculiar symbolism of these living-beings, nor of the part which they perform in the act of praise below. There are many other interpretations and ramifications of interpretation, hardly worth recounting. But the one which above all these seems to me to require our notice is that which is indicated in the rabbinical sentence cited by Schöttgen here: "There are four which hold pre-eminence in this world: man among all animals; the eagle among birds; the ox among cattle; the lion among beasts." The four cherubic forms are the representatives of animated nature—of God's sentient creation. In Ezekiel, each form is compounded of the four. Here, the four forms are distinct. There [xxviii. 12], where the prince of Tyrus is compared to one of them, it is called the impression of similitude, and the crown of beauty: in Isaiah vi. where the seraphim, which enter into the composition of these living-beings, ascribe holiness to Jehovah, they cry, "His glory is the fulness of the whole earth." With this view every thing that follows is in accordance. For when these, and the 24 elders, in vv. 9—11, fall down before the throne, the part which these living-beings bear in the great chorus of praise is sufficiently indicated by the reason which they give for their ascription, viz. for Thou art worthy, because Thou didst create all things, and because of Thy will they were, and were created. The objection brought against this view by Ebrard, viz. that Behemoth, the king of the waters, is not here represented, is mere trifling. He forgets that in the record of creation, the noblest of the creatures sprung from the waters are not fishes, but birds; and that the eagle represents both. It is in strict accordance also with this view, that these living-beings are full of eyes, ever wakeful, ever declaring the glory of God: that they have each six wings, which doubtless are to be taken as in Isa. vi. from which the figure comes—"with twain he covered his face [reverence, in not venturing to look on the divine majesty], and with twain he covered his feet [humility, hiding his own created form from the glory of the Creator], and with twain he did fly [obedience, readiness to perform the divine commands]." This view is taken by the best of the modern Commentators: by Herder, De Wette, Rinck, Hengstenberg, Düsterdieck. Ebrard differs only in this, that he regards them as symbolic not of creation itself, but of the creative power of God. Stern, whose commentary on this whole passage is very able and beautiful, inclines rather to take them as representing the power of divine grace within the church of God: but in his usual interpretation treats them as "the whole creative-life of nature." See also my Hulsean Lectures for 1841, vol. i. Lecture ii. We have thus the throne of God surrounded by His Church and His animated world: the former represented by the 24 elders, the latter by the four living-beings.

9—11.] The everlasting song of praise of creation in which the church joins. It is well observed by Düsterdieck, that the ground of this ascription of praise is not redemption, which first comes in at ch. v. 9 ff.,—but the power and glory of God as manifested in Creation; so that the words of the elders are in beautiful harmony with the praise of the four living-beings, and with the signification of the whole vision. And whosoever the living-beings shall give (the future must not be pressed quite so strongly as is done by De Wette [so also Stern], "from henceforth for all the time to come: see ch. vii. 15 ff.: before-time it was not so, seeing that the 24 elders have only assumed their place since Christ's work of Redemption has been proceeding and His victory developing." Still, it has a distinct pointing onward towards the future, implying eternal repetition of the act) glory and honour (i. e., recognition of His glory and honour) and thanksgiving (i. e., actual giving of thanks) to Him that sitteth upon the throne, to Him that liveth to the ages of the ages, the twenty-four elders shall fall down before Him that sitteth upon the throne, and shall worship Him that liveth to the ages of the ages (ch. v. 8,

xix. 4), and shall cast down their crowns (to disclaim all honour and dignity of their own, and acknowledge that all belongs to Him. Instances of casting down crowns are cited by the Commentators. Tacitus relates that Tiridates advanced to the image of Nero, took his crown from his head and threw it down at the feet of the image) before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord and our (Düsterdieck remarks that the our has a force here peculiarly belonging to the 24 elders, as representing the redeemed, and thus standing in a covenant relation to God nearer than that of the 4 living-beings. But we must not forget, that Creation is only a part of Redemption, Col. i. 20) God, to receive the glory (the glory &c., as alluding to the glory &c., ver. 9, ascribed by the living-beings. The articles are improperly omitted in the A. V.) and the honour and the might (observe that the might, in the mouth of the 24 elders, represents thanksgiving in that of the 4 living-beings. The elders, though themselves belonging to creation, in this ascription of praise look on creation from without, and that thanksgiving, which creation renders for its being, becomes in their view a tribute to Him who called them into being, and thus a testimony to His creative power. And thus the reason follows): because Thou didst create all things ("this universal whole," the universe), and on account of Thy will (i. e., because Thou didst will it: "for thy pleasure," of the A. V., introduces an element entirely strange to the context, and, however true in fact, most inappropriate here, where the because renders a reason for the worthiness to receive the glory, honour, and power) they were (not exactly came into being: for this the word cannot signify: nor again, though thus the requirement of the word would be satisfied, were, in thy decree from eternity, before they were created: nor again as Bengel, "all things were, from the creation down to the time of this ascription of praise and henceforward." The best explanation is that of Düsterdieck, they existed, as in contrast to their previous non-existence: whereby not their coming into being, but the simple fact of their being, is asserted. A remarkable reading of some of our MSS. is worth notice: "by reason of Thy will they were not, and were created:" i. e., "they were created out of nothing"), and were created (they both had their being,—and received it from Thee by a definite act of Thine).

CH. V. 1—14.] The book with seven seals, containing the things which must happen after these things, which the Seer was to be shewn, ch. iv. 1. None found worthy to open it but the Lamb, who takes it for this purpose, amidst the praises of the heavenly host, of the church, and of the creation of God.

1.] The sealed book. And I saw (notice, that from the general vision, in the last chapter, of the heavenly Presence of God, the scene is so far only changed that, all that remaining as described, a particular incident is now seen for the first time, and is introduced by And I saw) (lying) on the right hand (i. e. the right hand was open, and the book lay on the open hand. So in ch. xx. 1, where see note. The common rendering, in the right hand, misses this sense. The lying on the open hand imports, that on God's part there was no withholding of His future purposes as contained in this book. The only obstacle to unsealing it was as follows, ver. 3) of Him that sat upon the throne a book (i. e., "a roll of a book," as in Ezek. ii. 9 f. This explanation alone will suit the meaning of the word as applied to the contemporary practice regarding sacred writings. See also Jer. xxxvi. 2, 23; Zech. v. 2: and below) written within and behind (such scrolls, written not only, as commonly, on the inner side, but also on the outer, which, to one reading the inner, was behind [see below], are mentioned by Pliny, Lucian, Juvenal, and Martial. This writing, within and without, so that the whole roll was full, seems to betoken the completeness of the contents as containing the divine counsels: there was no room for addition to that which was therein written. This would be of itself a sufficient reason for the fulness of the scroll. To see two divisions of written matter indicated, by the writing within, and by that on the back, correspondent to one another, seems hardly warranted by the text), fast-sealed with seven seals (not, consisting of seven writings, each sealed with one seal, as various Commentators hold: but one book, fastened with seven seals, which were visible to the Apostle. Various ingenious methods have been imagined, by which the opening of each of these seals may have loosened a corresponding portion of the roll. But they all proceed on the assumption that the roll in the vision was unfolded, which is nowhere to be gathered from the text. Nor have we any right to say that the separate visions which follow the opening of each seal are identical with separate portions of writing on the roll. These visions are merely symbolic representations of the progress of God's manifestation of the purpose of His will; but no portion of the roll is actually unfolded, nor is any thing read out of the book. Not its contents, but the gradual steps of access to it, are represented by these visions. What is in that book, shall not be known, until there shall be known to the powers and authorities in the heavenly places, by the Church, the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10: till those material events, which marked the gradual opening of the sum of God's purposes, are all past, and the roll is contemplated in its completeness by the spirits of the glorified hereafter. This completeness is here set forth to us again by the mystic number

seven. There are some excellent remarks on the entire distinctness of the opening of the seals, and the reading of the book, in Cornelius-a-lapide: "For nothing in the book would be read, except after the opening of all seven seals; for when all were opened, then at length the book could be opened and read, not before." So also Ribera: "Those calamities which were involved in the seals, were all to come, before the things which were written in the book appeared and were known."

Mr. Elliott, in his work "Apocalypsis Alfordiana," specially directed against my commentary on this book, treats this view with all the scorn which is unfortunately so characteristic of him: calling it absurd, unscriptural, &c. He has not produced a word of proof, or even illustrative corroboration, of his own view, that the opening of each seal corresponds to the unrolling of a certain portion of the scroll: but has contented himself with re-asserting it in the strongest language, and pouring contempt on those who hold the other view. I grieve to say, that this is so often the case throughout his above-mentioned work, as to render it impossible for me, in many places, to meet his objections in argument. One who distrusts his own as well as all other explanations, and believes that much of this mysterious book is as yet unfathomed, is no match for one who hesitates not on every occasion to shew his confidence that he is in the right, and all who differ from him are wrong. An enquiry here arises, What is represented by this Book? Opinions have been very various. 1) Some of our earliest Commentators understood by it the Old Testament: or the Old and New conjoined. It will appear from the extracts given in my Greek Test., that the opening of the seals was very generally by the earlier fathers and interpreters taken to mean, the fulfilment, and consequent bringing to light, of Old Test. prophecy by the events of Redemption as accomplished in the Person of our Lord. But, if so, then this view cannot consist with what follows in the Apocalypse. For manifestly the opening of the seals, as notified by the symbolic visions belonging to each, does not relate to things past, but to things which were yet future when this book was written. Nor can this apparent consensus of the early expositors be cited, as it has been e. g. by Dr. Adams, in support of any other view than theirs, in which this Book shall still represent the Old Test. Such for example is that of Dr. Adams himself, who regards the opening of the sealed book as symbolizing a future republication of the genuine text of the Old Test., by which the Jewish people is to be converted. The untenableness of this view appears at once, if only from [so to speak] its touching the apocalyptic course of visions at this point only, and finding no justification or expansion in any of the symbolic visions accompanying the opening of the seals. 2) Some have held the Book to be Christ Himself. But for the same reasons as above, neither can this be maintained. 3) Wetstein takes it to be "the writing of divorcement written by God against the Jewish nation:" which for the same reason falls to the ground. 4) Schöttgen, the sentence pronounced by the Judge and His assessors against the enemies of the Church: and similarly, in the main, Hengstenberg; but this view, though strongly defended by Hengstenberg, is not borne out by the contents of these chapters. 5) Aleasar holds it to be that part of the Apocalypse which treats of the opening of the seven seals [ch. vi.—xi.]: and nearly so Hengstenberg also, except that he allows only from vi. 1 to viii. 1 for this portion. But both are obviously wrong, seeing that the opening of the seventh seal evolves a series of symbolic actions which only ends with the book itself. So that (this comes to 6) the Book being the Apocalypse itself: so Cornelius-a-lapide, seeing in the seven seals that part relating to their opening, and after that regarding the subsequent visions concerning Antichrist and the end of the world, as the contents of the book itself. But he seems, in concluding his paragraph, to resolve this view into the wider one, 7) that the Book represents "the deliberation and decision of the Divine Providence, wherein God determined with Himself to do or permit, &c." This is very nearly that of Arethas, Lyra, Vitringa, Mede, Ewald, De Wette, Stern, Düsterdieck, and others. And this is, in the main, my own view. We may observe, that it is in fact but a limitation of this meaning, when many understand the Book to contain the prophetic fortunes of the Church of Christ: but also that it is a limitation which has arisen from the mistake noticed above, of confounding the opening of the seals with the reading of the contents of the book. Those successive openings, or if we will, the fortunes and periods of the Church and world, are but so many preparations for that final state of perfection in which the Lamb shall reveal to the Church the contents of the Book itself).

2.] And I saw a strong angel (the epithet strong is by no means superfluous, but corresponds to the loud voice below, which, as appears by what followed, penetrated heaven and earth, and Hades. Compare ch. x. 1, 3 and notes) proclaiming in a loud voice, Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals of it? and no one was able, in heaven, nor yet upon the earth, nor yet under the earth (in Hades, the place of departed spirits: not, in the sea), to open the book, nor yet to look on it (the looking on the book is an act subsequent to the opening it,—the looking on the book, with a view to read it. For the claim to open the book must be founded on a claim of worthiness to see that which was contained in it).

had been promised to him, ch. iv. 1, that he should be shewn future events: and now it seemed as if this promise were about to be frustrated by the lack of one worthy to open the book. There was no weakness of faith, as Hengstenberg fancies: indeed such a supposition is entirely out of place here: St. John is in this book the simple recipient of the Apocalypse; for that he is summoned to the heavenly scene, for that he is waiting in humility: but that now seems to be precluded, and his tears burst forth in the earnestness of disappointed desire after the fulfilment of the promise. Christ, as the opener of the book, is not yet revealed to him: and to have him anticipating that revelation by the power of his individual faith, would be to put him out of his place and violate consistency.

5.] And one from among the elders ("some say," says Lyra, "that it was Matthew the Evangelist, who said in the person of Christ, 'All power is given unto me in heaven and earth:':" he himself preferring Peter, who had before this suffered martyrdom, and who was "one, that is first, among the Apostles." But see the interpretation of the elders above, iv. 4. The elders, in their triumphant place round God's throne, know better than the Evangelist, yet clothed with the infirmities of this earthly state, the nature and extent of the victory and glory of Christ.

It is the practice of the book to introduce the heavenly beings thus talking with the Seer: compare ch. vii. 13 f.; x. 4, 8 ff.; xvii. 1; xix. 9; xxi. 9, &c.; xxii. 8, &c.) saith to me, Weep not: behold, the Lion which is from the tribe of Judah (from Gen. xlix. 9: the lion, as victorious: from the tribe of Judah, as the Messiah of promise, sprung from among the brethren of the Seer, and so carrying more comfort to him), the Root of David (from Isa. xi. 1, 10: i.e. the branch or sucker come up from the ancient root, and so representing it: not, as some, the divine root which brought forth David: for the evident design here is to set forth Christ as sprung from the tribe of Judah and lineage of David, and His victory as his exaltation through suffering, ver. 6), conquered (the A. V., "hath prevailed to open," loses sight of the victory of Christ, and of the uniform sense in which the verb to conquer is constantly used in this book. The past tense must not be resolved into a perfect, but points to the past event of that great victory, by virtue of which the opening is in His power), [so as] to open the book, and (in order to that) its seven seals.

6.] The vision of the Lamb. And I saw in the midst of the throne and of the four living-beings, and in the midst of the elders (the words seem to indicate the middle point before the throne: whether on the glassy sea or not, does not appear: but certainly not on the throne, from what follows in the next verse), a Lamb (literally, a little lamb; the diminutive, as applied to our Lord, is peculiar to the Apocalypse. It is difficult to say what precise idea is meant to be conveyed by this form of the word. Elsewhere, we have another form: John i. 29, 36; 1 Pet. i. 19; Acts viii. 32: and as that is found in Isa. liii. 7, from which the figure here is taken, the alteration of the word appears to be purposely made. Possibly it may be to put forward more prominently the idea of meekness and innocence) standing (i. e. in its natural living position: the word is probably chosen on account of what immediately follows. Though as if slain, it was not lying, but standing) as if slain (i. e. retaining the appearance of death-wounds on its body: looking as if it had been slain: compare ch. i. 18. So the majority of Commentators. Ebrard is quite wrong in supposing that the as if has any emphasis on it: it merely serves to solve the apparent paradox lying in the juxtaposition of standing and slain), having seven horns (the horn is the well-known emblem of might: compare 1 Sam. ii. 10; 1 Kings xxii. 11; Ps. cxii. 9, cxlviii. 14; Dan. vii. 1, 20 ff., viii. 3 ff.; ch. xvii. 3 ff. The perfect number seven represents that "all power is given unto Him in heaven and earth," Matt. xxviii. 18) and seven eyes, which (eyes) are the seven spirits of God sent forth into the whole earth (i. e. which eyes represent the watchful active operation of God's Spirit poured forth through the Death and by the victory of the Lamb, upon all flesh and all creation. As the seven burning lamps before the throne represented the Spirit of God immanent in the Godhead, so the seven eyes of the Lamb represent the same Spirit in his sevenfold perfection, profluent, so to speak, from the incarnate Redeemer: busied in His world-wide and world-long energy: the very word used, apostalmena, reminding us of the apostolic work and church. Compare Zech. iv. 10: "Those seven . . . they are the eyes of the Lord which run to and fro through the whole earth").

7.] The Lamb takes the Book. And he (or, it) came and took (not, 'received,' as Ebrard. The book lay on the open hand of Him that sat on the throne, for any to take who was found worthy) it (i. e. the Book; compare next verse) out of the right hand of Him that sat upon the throne (Vitringa's enquiry, whether we are to imagine the Lamb to have had partly a human form and hands, is rightly dismissed by Diesterdieck as unneeded, and bespeaking want of tact).

8.] Song of praise following thereupon. And when he took (not, "when he had taken," as A. The twenty-four elders, representing as they do the whole church of God, are represented as offering the praises and the prayers of the whole church: the harps representing the former, the censers the latter. saints for the church below, or indeed of the glorified saints at all, there is not the least mention, nor does this passage touch the question of the fact of such intercession. In the division of the two employments, the most of prayer falls to the lot of the church in trial, and the most of praise to the church in glory: and this is perhaps the reason why, while they have harps on which they themselves play, they only offer or present the vials of incense. De Wette remarks, that the Writer of the Apocalypse seems not to know any thing of the intercessory office of Christ. But that office is prominent through this whole scene. What is the Lamb as it had been slain—what the confession, “Thou redeemedst us to God by Thy blood,” but recognitions of it? It underlies the whole book): and they sing (why present? Is it because the sound still lingered in his ears? Or more probably, as describing their special and glorious office generally, rather than the mere one particular case of its exercise?) a new song (new, because the occasion was new; the manifestation of the worthiness of the Lamb calls forth fresh words springing from fresh and living thoughts. These words which follow could not be spoken except by those who had seen Christ’s redemption complete; therefore they must needs be new), saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals of it: for Thou wast slain, and didst redeem (the object is not expressed, nor need it be: see similar constructions, Matt. xxv. 8; 1 John iv. 13. The us, which is in the MSS. added or prefixed to the verb, has considerable authority, but on the whole seems more likely to have been inserted, considering the prevalent early interpretation of the elders as Apostles and Prophets, than omitted because they were imagined to be angels) to God by (literally, in, as the vehicle, and conditioning element of redemption) thy blood out of every tribe, and tongue and people and nation (the only thing to be noticed is the quadruple number of these specifications, as indicating universality: see again below, ver. 13); and madest them a kingdom and priests, and they reign upon the earth (“this clause differs from that in ch. i. 6, both by the and before ‘priests,’ and by the important addition ‘and they reign,’ &c. Here we have three particulars: 1) that those who are bought to be God’s own are made into a kingdom, viz. God’s,—2) that they are made into priests,—3) that they are invested with kingly power. So rightly Ebrard.” Düsterdieck. The present tense, they reign, is not to be rendered as a future, but keeps its own meaning [the whole aspect and reference of this heavenly vision being not future, but present: the world and church as now existing, compare Eph. ii. 6]. The Church even now, in Christ her Head, reigns on the earth: all things are being put under her feet, as under His: and even if this meaning be questioned, we have her kingly rank and office asserted in the present, even in the midst of persecution and contempt).

The Church, as the vehicle of the work of Redemption, of which Creation is but a part, is the central and crowning manifestation of God's power and love and wisdom. Round it, and Him who is its Head, the heavenly hosts are ranged in humble admiration; and into its wonders they desire to look. Compare Eph. iii. 10; 1 Pet. i. 12); and the number of them was myriads of myriads and thousands of thousands (i. e. innumerable in its vastness. out the fact of all these, as one, belonging to God, whose power and glory the Lamb is declared worthy to share. Of the particulars themselves, riches is better kept in its generality, all riches and fulness, than limited to spiritual riches; see 1 Chron. xxix. 11: blessing is in the sense so frequent when the word and its cognate verb are used of an act passing from man to God: viz. that of ascribed praise: the will on the part of the creature, though unaccompanied by the power, to return blessing for blessing conferred. The idea of Bengel, that the septenary number has to do with the seven seals, is hardly probable: the number, as indicating completeness, running through the whole book).

that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb (the Church, including Creation, gives praise to the Lamb for Redemption, vv. 9, 10: the angels praise the infinite condescension of the Son of God: the entire universe celebrates the glory of the universal Father, and of the Redeemer, thence accruing) be (or, is, belongs) the blessing and the honour and the glory and the might (notice the fourfold arrangement where universality is set forth; and the repeated article, exhaustive of each predicated separately. CHAP. VI. 1—VIII. 1.] THE OPENING OF THE SEVEN SEALS. As preliminary to the exposition of this section, I may observe that it is of the first importance to bear in mind, that the openings of these seals correspond to the various arrangements of God's Providence by which the way is prepared for the final opening of the closed book of His purposes to His glorified Church. That opening shall not fully and freely be made, till His people will know even as they are known. And that will not be, till they are fully gathered in to His heavenly garner. This book the Lamb opens, containing as it does matters which “no one knoweth, neither the angels which are in heaven, nor even the Son,” first by the acts and procedures of His establishment of His reign over the earth, and then finally by His great second coming, the necessary condition of His elect being gathered out of the four winds into His glory. When these preparations for His coming have taken place, and that coming itself has passed, and the elect are gathered into glory, then will be the time when the last hindrance to our perfect knowledge will be removed, and the book of God's eternal purposes will lie open—the theme of eternity's praise.

I may add that for the sake of perspicuity, I shall mainly follow, in these notes, the track of that interpretation which seems to me to be required; noticing only differences in those of other Commentators where absolutely necessary.

1—8.] The opening of the first four seals, marked by the ministration of the four living-beings.

1.] And I saw when the Lamb opened one from among the seven seals, and I heard one from among the four living-beings saying, as the voice of thunder (which is to be taken not as peculiarly belonging to this first as resembling a lion, but as belonging to all alike, and accounted for by their mysterious and exalted nature: compare ch. i. 10, x. 3), Come (to whom, and with what meaning is this spoken? The great majority of Commentators have taken the received reading, which fixes it by adding “and look,” or, “and see,” as an address to the Seer, to approach nearer and look at the coming vision. And even those who have rejected this addition have yet regarded it as a true gloss, and the "Come" as addressed to the Seer. But whither was he to come ? Separated as he was by the glassy sea from the throne, was he to cross it ? Compare the place where the Seer is to come and take the little book [ch. x. 8], and see how different is the whole form of expression. In interpreting so unusual a term of address, surely we should rather begin by enquiring whether we have not the key to it in the book itself. And in this enquiry, are we justified in leaving out of consideration such a verse as ch. xxii. 17, "The Spirit and the Bride say Come [the same word, and in the same number and person], and let him that heareth say Come," and the following "Amen, Come, Lord Jesus," xxii. 22 ? This seems to shew, in my mind, beyond a doubt, what, in the mind of the Seer, this remarkable and insulated exclamation imported. It was a cry addressed, not to himself, but to the Lord Jesus : and as each of these four first seals is accompanied by a similar cry from one of the four living-beings, I see represented in this fourfold Come the groaning and travelling together of creation for the manifestation of the sons of God, expressed in each case in a prayer for Christ's coming : and in the things revealed when the seals are opened, His fourfold preparation for His coming on earth. Then at the opening of the fifth seal the longing of the martyred saints for the same great consummation is expressed, and at that of the sixth it actually arrives). And I saw, and behold a white horse, and he that sat on him having a bow ; and a crown was given unto him, and he went forth conquering, and in order that he may conquer (in the first place, the figure of the horses and their riders at once brings to mind the similar vision in Zechariah, i. 7—11, vi. 1—8, where the men on the horses are they whom the Lord hath sent to walk to and fro through the whole earth. In Zech. i. as here, that part of the vision is followed, ver. 12, by the cry of the "How long ?" Here the horses and their riders are the various aspects of the divine dispensations which should come upon the earth preparatory to the great day of the Lord's coming. As regards this first, the whole imagery speaks of victory. The horses of the Roman commanders in their triumphs were white. The bow serves to identify the imagery here with that in Habakkuk iii. 9, where God goes forth for the salvation of His people : see also Isa. xli. 2 ; Zech. ix. 13 : and even more strikingly with that in Ps. xlv. 4, 5, "In thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth and meekness and righteousness : and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things. Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies ; whereby the people fall under thee." It is hardly possible that one whose mind was full of such imagery, should have had any other meaning in his thoughts than that to which these prophecies point. The crown finds its parallel in the vision of Zech. vi., where, ver. 11, it is said, "Take silver and gold, and make crowns, and set them upon the head of Joshua the son of Josedeck, the high priest." The going forth conquering and in order to conquer can only, it seems to me, point to one interpretation. The conquering might be said of any victorious earthly power whose victories should endure for the time then present, and afterwards pass away : but the in order that he may conquer can only be said of a power whose victories should last for ever. Final and permanent victory then is here imported. Victory, we may safely say, on the part of that kingdom against which the gates of hell shall not prevail : whose fortunes and whose trials are the great subject of this revelation. Such is the first vision, the opening of the first seal in the mystery of the divine purposes : victory for God's church and people : the great key-note, so to speak, of all the apocalyptic harmonies. And notice, that in this interpretation, there is no lack of correspondence with the three visions which follow.

All four are judgments upon the earth: the beating down of earthly power, the breaking up of earthly peace, the exhausting of earthly wealth, the destruction of earthly life. Nor is this analogy disturbed, when we come to enquire, who is the rider on this white horse. We must not, in reply, on the one hand, too hastily introduce the Person of our Lord Himself, or on the other, be startled at the objection that we shall be paralleling Him, or one closely resembling Him, with the far different forms which follow. Doubtless, the resemblance to the rider in ch. xix. 11 ff. is very close, and is intended to be very close. The difference however is considerable. There, He is set forth as present in His triumph, followed by the hosts of heaven: here, He is working, in bodily absence, and the rider is not Himself, but only a symbol of His victorious power, the embodiment of His advancing kingdom as regards that side of its progress where it breaks down earthly power, and makes the kingdom of the world to be the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ. Further it would not be wise, nor indeed according to the analogy of these visions, to specify. In all cases but the last, these riders are left in the vagueness of their symbolic offices. If we attempt in this case to specify further, e. g. as Victorinus, "The white horse is the word of preaching with the aid of the Holy Spirit sent forth into the world; for the Lord saith, This gospel shall be preached through all the world, for a testimony before the nations, and then shall the end come,"—while we are sure that we are thus far right, we are but partially right: we do not cover the extent of the symbol, seeing that there are other aspects and instruments of victory of the kingdom of Christ, besides the preaching of the Word. The same might be said of any other of the partial interpretations which have been given by those who have taken this view. And it was taken, with divergences of separate detail, by all expositors from the earliest times down to the year 1500).

3, 4.] And when he opened the second seal, I heard the second living-being saying, Come (see above on ver. 1). And there came forth another horse, red (the colour of blood. The colour of the horse in each case has reference to the employment of the rider), and to him that sat upon him it was given to take away peace (not "the peace left by the former seal," for 1) the former seal neither implies nor leaves such peace, and 2) these four seals are strictly correlative, not consecutive on one another; but, peace in its entirety) out of the earth (generally, as ever: not, Judaea, nor the Roman empire, nor any special portion merely) and that they (men: the inhabitants of the earth) shall kill (so literally: not only importing the result of purpose, but including also matter of fact, "that they may . . . which they also shall") one another; and there was given to him a great sword (the key to the interpretation of this seal is to be found in Matt. x. 34 and parallels: "Think not that I came to send peace upon the earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword." It represents to us the taking away of peace from the earth, the slaying one another, the reign of the sword, as one of the destined concomitants of the growing and conquering power of Christ, and one of the world-long and world-wide preparations for His coming. Observe, all limitations of this meaning are wrong; whether to the persecutions of the Christians, or to any period of time, ancient or modern. The above was the most ancient interpretation; e. g. we have in Victorinus, "The red horse, and he that sat upon him having a sword, are future wars, as we read in the gospel, for nation shall rise against nation, &c." Matt. xxiv. 7).

5, 6.] And when he opened the third

seal, I heard the third living-being saying, Come (see above on ver. 1). And I saw, and behold a black horse (the colour is indicative of the mournful nature of the employment of the rider: see below), and he that sat on him having a balance (the symbol of scarcity, during which the bread is doled out by weight: see Ezek. iv. 16, "They shall eat bread by weight, and with care;" and Levit. xxvi. 26, "When I have broken the staff of your bread, ten women shall bake your bread in one oven, and they shall deliver you your bread again by weight; and ye shall eat, and not be satisfied.") The meaning "yoke," instead of balance, is one which in this connexion cannot be justified. On the import, see below) in his hand. And I heard as it were (this qualification must apparently be taken with the whole clause—"something like [a voice in the midst of the four living-beings]," the uncertainty applying to the situation, not to its being a voice, which it was) a voice in the midst of the four living-beings (it is not specified, whose voice: but the point from which the voice comes is appropriate to its intent, which is to mitigate the woes of creation, represented by the four living-beings: see below), saying (Let there be) A chœnix (see below) of wheat for a denarius, and three chœnixes of barley for a denarius (the sense seems to be, Take care that there be thus much food for thus much price. The denarius was the ordinary soldier's pay for a day in the time of Tiberius [see note on Matt. xx. 2], and has been usually and not unfairly assumed to be twice mentioned here as representing a day's wages. The chœnix appears in like manner to be taken for a day's provision: for so it is used in several of the numerous places cited by the Commentators. Herodotus, in estimating the amount of food consumed by the army of Xerxes, assumes this: "I find by calculation," he says, "supposing that each consumed a chœnix a day and no more . . ." and similarly Thucydides, speaking of the allowance made to the Lacedæmonians in Sphacteria while negotiations were going on. A proverb also is mentioned, "Don't sit upon a chœnix," meaning, "don't confine your provision to the current day, a chœnix being an allowance for the day." Nothing can be more decisive than such proverbial usage. The tendency of the voice is then to check or limit the agency of the rider on the black horse, and to provide that, notwithstanding his errand of famine, sustenance shall not utterly fail. With regard to the three chœnixes of barley, the cheaper and less profitable grain, it seems to have been rightly interpreted as taking in the other case, of the workman who, out of his denarius a day, has to maintain not himself only, but his family also, and cannot consequently afford the dearer wheaten bread); and the oil and the wine do not thou injure (not, "do thou not commit injustice in the matter of the oil and the wine." The usage of this book should have prevented such an interpretation: for the verb here used with the accusative of the material object hurt or injured is the constant habit of our Writer: and in no case do we find the other construction used by him, or indeed by any other writer to my knowledge. Kinck gives another meaning, equally untenable, "waste not the oil and the wine," seeing they are so costly.

As regards the meaning, the spirit of the saying is as explained above: the rider on the black horse, symbolizing Famine, is limited in his desolating action by the command given, that enough is to be reserved for sustenance. Wheat, barley, oil, and wine, formed the ordinary sources of nourishment: see Ps. civ. 14, 15. So that as regards its intent, the command is parallel with that saying of our Lord in Matt. xxiv. 22. It is the mercy of God, tempering His judgments. And in its general interpretation, as the opening of the first seal revealed the certain proceeding on to victory of Christ and His church, and the second, that His coming should be prepared in the world not by peace but by the sword, so now by this third we learn that Famine, the pressure of want on men, not sweeping them away by utter failure of the means of subsistence, but keeping them far below the ordinary standard of comfort, and especially those who depend on their daily labour, will be one of the four judgments by which the way of the Lord's coming will be opened. This seems to point not so much to death by famine, which belongs to the next vision, as to agrarian distress with all its dreadful consequences: ripening in some cases [see below] into the hunger-death, properly the consequence of Famine.

The above interpretation of the third seal is given in the main by Victorinus—"The black horse signifies famine: for the Lord saith, 'There shall be famines in places:'" but he allegorizes the latter part of the vision: "hurt not the oil and the wine," i. e., "strike not with plagues the spiritual man" ).

7, 8.] And when he opened the fourth seal, I heard [the voice of] the fourth living-being saying, Come (see above on ver. 1). And I saw, and behold a livid horse (the word, meaning originally and properly grass-green, when used of flesh implies that greenish pallor which we know as livid: the colour of the corpse in incipient decay, or of the complexion extremely pale through disease), and he that sat upon him his name was Death (i. e.

he was death personified. In this case only of the four is the explanation given. It is wrong to understand Pestilence by this death: see below), and Hadés (the impersonation of the place of the departed: see ch. i. 18, xx. 14, where as here Death and Hadés go together. Eichhorn and Ebrard understand it of the whole multitude of the departed: but this clearly is beside the purpose: personification being the prevailing character of these four riders) was following with him (in his train: ready to engulf and detain his victims), and there was given to them (Death and Hadés, considered as joint partners in the baleful work) power over the fourth part of the earth (perhaps owing to the four-fold division of these former seals: not implying thereby that this last rider divided the earth with the three former, but thus specifying his portion as being one of four. At all events this suggests itself here as a possible reference of the number four: whereas in ch. viii. the continually recurring third part has no such assignable solution. The expositors for the most part pass it over, merely as signifying a considerable portion. Our principal English historical interpreter, with whose historical interpretation it will not square, takes refuge in the reading of the vulgate, "over [the] four parts of the earth." But the reading cannot for a moment be received on such authority; nor are we at liberty to arrange the sacred text so as to square with our preconceived systems) to kill with sword and with famine and with death (i. e. here, pestilence: see below), and by (by, seeing that the other three were rather general indications of the manner in which, but this last of the actual agent by whose administration) the wild beasts of the earth (the enumeration comprehends the "four sore judgments" enumerated in Ezek. xiv. 21, and in the same terms. This fixes the meaning of this second and subordinate death as above.

This seal also is interpreted as above by the earliest Commentators: e.g. Victorinus: "These same also, among other means of death, the Lord had foretold, great coming pests and mortalities." But as on the third seal, so here also, he goes off into vague allegory about the latter part of the vision).

We have now passed the four first seals, after which the character of the vision changes. One feature common to these four is, Personification: the representation of processions of events by the impersonation of their leading features. Another is, the share which the four living-creatures bear in the representation, which after this point ceases, as far as the seals are concerned. In my mind, no interpretation can be right, which does not take both these common features into account. And this may best be done by viewing, as above, these four visions as the four solemn preparations for the coming of the Lord as regards the visible Creation, which these four living-beings symbolize. The whole Creation demands His coming. COME, is the cry of all its tribes. This cry is answered, first by the vision of the great Conqueror, whose arrows are in the heart of his enemies, and whose career is the world's history. The breaking of this first seal is the great opening of the mystery of God. This in some sense includes and brings in the others. Those others then, as we might expect, hold a place subordinate to this. They are, in fact, but exponents of the mysteries enwrapt within this conquering career: visions of the method of its being carried out to the end in its operation on the outward world. That the world-wide declaration of the everlasting Gospel should be accompanied by war, by famine, by pestilence, and other forms of death, had been announced by our Lord Himself [Matt. xxiv. 11], and is now repeated in this series of visions. The fulfilment of each of these judgments is, as it were, the removing a seal from the book of God's mysterious purposes: the bringing nearer of the time when that book shall be open for all the redeemed to read.

With regard to the question whether these four visions are to be regarded as consecutive or contemporaneous, I have already expressed an opinion. In their fulness, I believe them to be contemporaneous, and each of them to extend through the whole lifetime of the church. The analogy of the whole four symbols seems to require this. We read nothing implying that there are "days" of the opening of any particular seal, as there are, ch. x. 7, of the sounding of the several trumpets. The in order that he may conquer of the first seal speaks of a purpose which will not be accomplished till the earth be all subjugated: and if I am right in supposing the other visions subordinate to this, their agency is necessarily included in its process. At the same time I would by no means deny that they may receive continually recurring, or even ultimate fulfilments, as the ages of the world go on, in distinct periods of time, and by distinctly assignable events. So far we may derive benefit from the commentaries of those who imagine that they have discovered their fulfilment in successive periods of history, that, from the very variety and discrepancy of the periods assigned by them, we may verify the fact of the prevalence of these announced judgments, hitherto, throughout the whole lifetime of the Church.

As regards ultimate fulfilment, there can be no doubt, that all these judgments on the world without, as well as the manifestation [of which they form a part] of the conquering career of the Kingdom of Christ, will reach their culminating point before the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord.

I may add, that no account whatever is taken, in the common historic interpretation, of the distinctive character of the four first seals, as introduced by the cry of the four living-beings: nor indeed is any interpretation commonly given of that cry itself.

9—11.] OPENING OF THE FIFTH SEAL.

We may at once observe, that the whole character of the vision is altered. The four living-beings have uttered each his cry of Come, and are now silent. No more horses and riders go forth upon the earth. The scene is changed to the heavenly altar, and the cry is from thence. Any interpretation which makes this vision of the same kind with and consecutive to the four preceding, must so far be wrong. In one point only is the character of the former vision sustained. It is the "dwellers upon the earth" who are the objects of the judgment invoked: as it was the earth, and its inhabitants, and its produce, which were the objects of the former judgments. See again below on the sixth seal.

9.] And when he opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar (it is an altar of sacrifice which is here meant; the peculiar form of the word slain, which follows, seems plainly to imply this: see below) the souls (i. e. departed spirits. It is manifestly idle to enquire, seeing that the Apostle was in a state of spiritual and supernatural vision, how these disembodied spirits became visible to him. That they were not clothed with bodies is manifest) of those that have been slain on account of the word of God and on account of the testimony which they had (so literally: i. e., which was committed to them to bear, and which they bore: see ch. xii. 17.

Much has been said about the souls of the martyrs not being their departed spirits, which must be conceived of as being in bliss with Christ, and in consequence it has been imagined that these were only their animal lives, resident in the blood and shed forth with it. But no such difficulty really exists. We know, whatever be the bliss of the departed martyrs and confessors, that they are waiting for the coming of the Lord, without which they are not perfect: and in the holy fire of their purified zeal, they look forward to that day as one of righteous judgment on the ungodly world. The representation here, in which they are seen under the altar, is simply symbolical, carrying out the likening of them to victims slain on an altar. Even as the blood of these victims was poured under the altar and the life was in the blood, so their souls are represented as under the symbolical altar in heaven, crying for vengeance, as blood is often said to do. After this, it hardly need be said that no inference can be drawn from this vision respecting the intermediate state between the death of the saints and the coming of the Lord): and they cried with a great voice, saying (they, viz. the souls, which are identified in the sentence with the persons themselves: not, as some think, the slain as distinguished from the souls). Until when (i. e. how long), thou Master (it is God who is here addressed; with Him rests the time when to avenge His elect, see Luke xviii. 7, 8) holy and true, dost thou not judge (give decision in the matter of) and exact vengeance for our blood from them that dwell on the earth (i. e. the ungodly world, as distinguished from the church of God)?

As hitherto, so here again, the analogy and order of our Lord's great prophecy in Matt. xxiv. 11 is closely followed. "The signs of His coming, and of the end of the world" were there announced by Himself as war, famine, and pestilence, vv. 6, 7. And when He had declared that these were but the beginning of sorrows, He next, vv. 9 f., announces the persecution and martyrdom of His people. Similarly here, after the judgments already announced, we have the prayer for vengeance on the part of the martyrs, and the announcement of more such martyrdoms to come. And as our Lord's prophecies received a partial fulfilment in the events preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, and may have done so again and again since, but await their great and final fulfilment when the day of His coming approaches, so it is with these. The cry of the martyrs' blood has been ever going up before God since Stephen fell: ever and anon, at some great time of persecution, it has waxed louder: and so on through the ages it shall accumulate and gather strength, till the great issue of the parable Luke xviii. 1 ff. is accomplished. And there was given to them each a white robe (there will be no real difficently in understanding this, if we are careful to mark its real place and interpret it accordingly. The white robe, in this book, is the vestment of acknowledged and glorified righteousness in which the saints walk and reign with Christ: see ch. iii. 4; vii. 13 ff., al. This was given to the martyrs: but their prayer for vengeance was not yet granted. The Seer saw in vision that this was so. The white robe was not actually bestowed as some additional boon, but seemed in vision to be thus bestowed, because in that vision one side only of the martyrs' intermediate state had been presented, viz. the fact of their slaughter and their collective cry for vengeance. Now, as over against that, the other more glorious side is presented, viz. that though the collective cry for vengeance is not yet answered, yet individually they are blessed in glory with Christ, and waiting for their fellows to be fully complete), and it was said to them that they should rest (not merely, abstain from their cry for vengeance, be quiet;—but, rest in blessedness, see ch. xiv. 13, and Dan. xii. 13) yet a little while, until their fellow-servants (a title corresponding to Master above) also and their brethren (the two substantives describe the same persons; those who are at the same time their fellow-servants and their brethren: the former term reminding them of the necessity of completeness as far as the service of their one Master is concerned: the latter, as far as they belong to one and the same great family) shall have accomplished (viz. "their course"), who are about to be slain as also they were.

The interpretation of this sixth seal is a crucial point in Apocalyptic exegesis. We may unhesitatingly set down all interpretations as wrong, which view as the fulfilment of this passage any period except that of the coming of the Lord. See the grounds of this below. And I saw when he opened the sixth seal, and a great earthquake took place (we have no word but "earthquake" for the word, literally shaking, here used in the original: but it does not by any means cover the meaning. For here the heavens are shaken, and the sea, and the dry land. See Hag. ii. 6, 7, and the comment in Heb. xii. 26 f. Compare also Zech. xiv. 4, 5), and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair (see Isa. l. 3. The cloth meant is the cilicium, or hair cloth: see note on Acts xviii. 3. This answers to Matt. xxiv. 29,—"Immediately after the tribulation of those days, shall the sun be darkened," . . . and to "the sun shall be turned into darkness," in Joel ii. 31), and the whole moon (i. e. not the moon in her crescent or her incomplete form, but entire; as we say, the full moon) became as blood (so Matt. as before, "and the moon shall not give her light;" and Joel ii. 31, "and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come"), and the stars of the heaven fell to the earth (so Matt. as before, "and the stars shall fall

The imagery itself, as that in the beginning of the next verse, is from Isa. xxxiv. 4). And the heaven parted asunder as a scroll when rolled up (the stars having fallen from it, the firmament itself was removed away, as an open scroll which is rolled up and put by. So also almost verbatim, Isa. xxxiv. 4), and every mountain and island were moved out of their places (compare again Matt. xxiv. 35, "heaven and earth shall pass away:" the whole earth is broken up by a change as total as any of those previous ones which have prepared it for its present inhabitants. Compare ch. xvi. 20; and Nahum i. 5). And the kings of the earth, and the great men (the great civil officers, statesmen and courtiers, as distinguished from the next following), and the chief captains (in Acts xxi.—

Now, the catalogue becomes more general), and every man, bond and free, hid themselves in the caves and in the rocks of the mountains (see Isa. ii. 19, from which the imagery comes), and say to the mountains and to the rocks, Fall upon us, and hide us from the countenance (see Nahum i. 6: and compare Ps. xxxiv. 16, "The countenance [face] of the Lord is against them that do evil") of Him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb (the imagery is from Hosea x. 8, further impressed by our Lord's solemn saying on the way to Calvary, Luke xxiii. 30:—the meaning, that all these shall seek death or annihilation in terror of the coming day, when they shall have to stand before God): because the great day (we have no way in English of expressing the title here used without an awkward periphrasis.

It is literally, 'the day, that great day.' This name, if properly considered, should have kept expositors firm here to the great verity of this part of the Apocalyptic visions, and prevented them from going into all sorts of incongruous interpretations, as they have done) of His wrath is come, and who is able to stand?—We are thus brought to the very threshold itself of the great day of the Lord's coming. It has not yet happened: but the tribes of the earth are troubled at its immediate approach, and those terrible signs with which all Scripture ushers it in, have taken place. We are now then arrived at the time described in Matt. xxiv. 30: the coming itself of the Son of man being for a while kept in the background, as hereafter to be resumed. He is seen as it were coming: but before the vengeance is fully accomplished, the elect of God then living on the earth must be gathered, as Matt. xxiv. 31, out of the four winds of heaven, from among the inhabitants of the earth. To this ingathering the sealing in our text is the necessary preliminary. The correspondence between the series of prophecies holds even in the minutest particulars, and where they do not correspond, their very differences are full of instruction. See these pointed out as we proceed.

CH. VII. 1—8.] THE SEALING OF THE ELECT. [And] after this (these words shew that the opening of the sixth seal is complete, and that what is now to follow, —viz. the two visions each introduced with similar words, after this [or, these things] I saw,—comes in by way of episode. They represent two great events, the sealing of the elect on earth, and the final assemblage of the saints in heaven. The great day of the Lord's judgment is not described; it is all but brought before us under the sixth seal, and is actually going on in the first of these episodes [see below]: but only that part of it which regards the saints appears to us, and that only by its result—their gathering in to heaven) I saw four angels (not, as many interpreters, bad angels; nor does it necessarily follow that we are to adopt the analogy of ch. xvi. 5 and to regard them as "angels of the winds:" but simply angels, to whom this office is committed. This is all that is declared to us in the text, and it is idle to enquire beyond it. All allegorizing and all individualizing interpretations are out of the question) standing upon the four corners of the earth (i. e. North, South, East, and West, the cardinal points from which the winds blow) holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind may not blow on the earth nor on the sea nor against any tree. And I saw another angel (as before, simply an angel: not as has been fancied, our Lord, nor the Holy Spirit; compare the words, of our God, below) coming up from the rising of the sun (coming up, because the rising of the sun is low on the earth's horizon, whereas the Apostle was in heaven, looking down on the earth: and from the rising of the sun, as naturally agreeing with the glorious and salutary nature of his employment. Compare Ezek. xliii. 2; Mal. iii. 2. The allegorical interpretations which have been given are entirely uncountenanced in the text), having the seal of the living God (living, as giving to the seal solemnity and vital import): and he cried with a great voice to the four angels to whom it was given to injure (viz. by letting loose the winds, which they as yet held in) the earth and the sea, saying, Do not ye injure the earth nor the sea nor the trees, until we (not, I: see Matt. xxiv. 31, cited below) shall have sealed the servants of our God (the God alike of the speaker and of those addressed) upon their foreheads (the noblest, as well as the most conspicuous part, of the human frame).

This vision stands in the closest analogy with Matt. xxiv. 31, where immediately after the appearing of the sign of the Son of man and the mourning of the tribes of the earth, we read, And He shall send His angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. The judgment of the great day is in fact going on in the background; but in this first and general summary of the divine judgments and dealings, in which the sighs of Creation and of the Church for Christ's coming are set before us, only that portion of its proceedings is described which has reference to these two. When the strain is again taken up, the case and reference are different.

The questions now arise, 1) who are these that are sealed? and 2) what is the intent of their being sealed? 1) Those who have followed the preceding course of interpretation will have no difficulty in anticipating the reply. They are, primarily, those elect of God who shall be living upon earth at the time here indicated, viz. that of the coming of the Lord: those indicated in Matt. xxiv. 31, above cited. (On the import and reason of the use of Israel and its tribes, I shall speak below.) As such, they are not identical with, but are included in, the great multitude which no man can number of ver. 9 ff. But they are also symbolical of the first-fruits of the church: see notes on ch. xiv. 1 ff.

4.] And I heard the number of the sealed, an hundred and forty-four thousand sealed (the number is symbolical of fixedness and full completion,  $12 \times 12$  taken a thousand fold. No one that I am aware of has taken it literally, and supposed that just this particular number and no more is imported. The import for us is, that the Lord knoweth and sealeth His own: that the fulness of their number shall be accomplished and not one shall fail: and, from what follows, that the least as well as the greatest of the portions of his Church shall furnish its quota to this blessed company: see more below) from every tribe (i. e. from the sum of the tribes; from every tribe, all being taken together. This is evident from what follows) of the sons of Israel (this has been variously understood. By many, and even by the most recent Commentator, Düsterdieck, these sealed ones are taken to represent Jewish believers: the chosen out of the actual children of Israel. I need hardly say that such an interpretation seems to me to be quite inconsistent with the usage of this book. Our rule in such cases must be, to interpret a term, where it may possibly be ambiguous, by the use of the same term, if we can discover any, in a place or places where it is clear and unmistakable. Now in the description of the heavenly Jerusalem, ch. xxi. 9 ff., we have the names of the twelve tribes of the sons of Israel inscribed on its twelve gates. Can there be any doubt as to the import of those names in that place? Is it not, that the city thus inscribed is the dwelling-place of the Israel of God? Or are the upholders of the literal sense here prepared to carry it out there, and to regard these inscribed names as importing that none but the literal descendants of Israel dwelt within? [For observe that such an inference could not be escaped by the fact of the names of the twelve Apostles being inscribed on its foundations: those being individual names, the others collective.] It seems certain, by this expression being again used there in the same words, that the Apostle must here, as there, have intended Israel to be taken not as the Jewish nation, but as the Israel of God. Again, we have a striking indication furnished in ch. iii. 12, who these children of Israel are:—“He that overcometh, . . . . I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God,—and my new name.” These words serve to bind together the sealing here, and the vision of the new Jerusalem in ch. xxi. Nor is it any valid objection to this view that the persons calling themselves Jews in ch. ii. 9, iii. 9, have been taken to be actual Jews. There is a wide difference in the circumstances there, as there is also in the appellation itself): out of the tribe of Judah, twelve thousand sealed, &c. &c.—The points to be noticed in this enumeration are, 1) That with the exception of Judah being placed first, the order of the tribes does not seem to follow any assignable principle. It may indeed be not without reason, that Reuben, the eldest, next follows Judah, and Benjamin the youngest is placed last, with Joseph his own brother: but beyond this, all is uncertainty: as any one will find, who attempts to apply to the order any imaginable rule of arrangement. So far has been generally confessed. “No order is kept, because all are equal in Christ,” says Grotius. 2) That the tribe of Dan is omitted. This is accounted for by the fathers and ancient interpreters, from the idea [founded on Gen. xlix. 17] that anti-christ was to arise from this tribe: by most Commentators, from the fact, that this tribe was the first to fall into idolatry, see Judg. xviii.: by others, from the fact that this tribe had been long ago as good as extinct. Grotius quotes for this a Jewish tradition. Accordingly we find in 1 Chron.

iv. ff. where all Israel are reckoned by genealogies, that this tribe is omitted altogether. This latter seems the more probable account here, seeing that in order to the number 12 being kept, some one of the smaller tribes must be omitted. In Deut. xxxiii., Simeon is omitted. 3) That instead of Ephraim, Joseph is mentioned. We have a somewhat similar instance in Numb. xiii. 11, with this difference, that there it is “of the tribe of Joseph, namely of the tribe of Manasseh.” The substitution here has been accounted for by the “untheocratic” recollections connected with the name Ephraim. But this may well be questioned. In the prophecy of Hosea, where the name so frequently occurs, it designates Israel repentant, as well as Israel backsliding; compare especially ch. xiv. 4–8, the recollection of which would admirably fit the spirit of this present passage. I should rather suppose that some practice had arisen which the Apostle adopts, of calling the tribe of Ephraim by this name. 4) That the tribe of Levi is included among the rest, hardly appears to depend on the reason assigned by Bengel and others, that the Levitical ceremonies being now at an end, all are alike priests and have access to God: for in some Old Test. catalogues, even where territorial division is in question, Levi is not omitted: the cities of the priests being mentioned under the head of this tribe. See 1 Chron. vi.

It yet remains to enquire, before passing on to the second vision in this episode, what is the import and intent of the sealing here mentioned. It has been the general view, that it was to exempt those sealed from the judgments which were to come on the unbelieving. And it can hardly be denied, that this view receives strong support from Scripture analogy, e. g. that of Exod. xii. and Ezek. ix., especially the latter, where the exempted ones are marked, as here, on their foreheads. It is also borne out by our ch. ix. 4, where these sealed ones are by implication exempted from the plague of the locusts from the pit. It is again hardly possible to weigh fairly the language used in this place itself, without coming to the same conclusion. The four angels are commanded not to begin their work of destruction, until the sealing has taken place. For what imaginable reason could such a prohibition be uttered, unless those who were to be sealed were to be marked out for some purpose connected with that work? And for what purpose could they be thus marked out, if not for exemption? The objection brought against this view by D sterdieck, that so far from being exempt from trials, the saints in glory have come out of great tribulation, is grounded on the mistake of not distinguishing between the trials of the people of God and the judgments on the unbelieving world. In the latter, the saints have no part, as neither had the children of Israel in the plagues of Egypt. And indeed the very symbolism here used, in which the elect are pointed out under the names of the 12 tribes, serves to remind us of this ancient exemption. At the same time, exemption from the coming plagues is not the only object of the sealing. It serves a positive as well as a negative purpose. It appropriates to God those upon whom it has passed. For the seal contains His own Name, see ch. iii. 12, xiv. 1. And thus they are not only gathered out of the world, but declared to be ready to be gathered into the city of God. And thus the way is prepared for the next vision in the episode.

9—17.] THE GREAT MULTITUDE OF THE REDEEMED IN HEAVEN. The opening of the sixth seal introduced the coming of the Lord. The first vision of the episode revealed the gathering together of the elect from the four winds. But before the seventh and last seal can be opened, and the book of God's purposes be unrolled, not only must all things on this earth be accomplished, but the whole multitude of the redeemed must be gathered in to the joy of their Lord. Then, and not till then, shall we know even as we are known, and read the mystery of God's ways without hindrance. Accordingly, in this sublime vision we are admitted to a sight of the finished state of glory, in which the seventh seal shall be opened. After these things (see above on ver. 1. The term indicates separation from that which went before, and introduces a second and distinct vision in the episode) I beheld, and lo a great multitude, which no one could (not that the attempt was actually made, but that if made it was sure to fail) number, out of every nation (see ch. v. 9), they, and whence came they (the questions are those ordinarily put when we seek for information respecting strangers; but put here for the sake of furnishing the explanation. Both enquiries are answered in ver. 14)? And I said to him, My lord (the address is one of deep reverence, as to a heavenly being. See the limits of this reverence in ch. xix. 10, xxii. 8, 9), thou knowest (see Ezek. xxxvii. 3, from which the form of expression comes. The words must not, with Elrard, be forced to mean, "I know well, but thou knowest better;" but must be taken in their simple acceptance, "I know not, but thou dost." And this again need not mean that the Apostle had no thought on the subject, but that he regarded himself as ignorant in comparison with his heavenly interlocutor). And he said to me, These are they that come (not, as A. V., "that came;" nor again must the present be put prominently forward, that are coming, as if the number in the vision were not yet complete: still less is it to be taken as a quasi-future, "that shall come;" but the present tense is merely one of designation. Their description, generically, is, that "they are they that come, &c.") out of the great tribulation (the definite article ought not to be omitted, as in A. V. It is most emphatic: "out of the tribulation, the great one." And in consequence some have explained the words of that last great time of trial which is to try the saints before the coming of the Lord. But to limit it to this only, is manifestly out of keeping with the spirit of the vision. I would rather understand it of the whole sum of the trials of the saints of God, viewed by the Elder as now complete, and designated by this emphatic and general name: "all that tribulation"), and they washed their robes (the past tense is that so often used of the course of this life when looked back upon from its yonder side: they did this in that life on earth which is now [in the vision] past and gone by) and made them white (the references are full of interest) in the blood of the Lamb (i. e. by that faith in the atoning blood of Christ of which it is said, "cleansing their hearts by the faith," Acts xv. 9: and 1 John i. 7, "the blood of Jesus Christ . . . cleanseth us from all sin." See also Eph. v. 25—27. Observe, we must not separate the two acts, washing and making white, as Hengstenberg does, interpreting the former of the forgiveness of sins, the latter of sanctification: the latter is only the result of the former: they washed them, and by so doing made them white. The act was a life-long one,—the continued purification of the man, body, soul, and spirit, by the application of the blood of Christ in its cleansing power). On this account (because they washed their robes white in Christ's atoning and purifying blood: for nothing that has spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, can stand where they are standing: compare again Eph. v. 27: none will be there who are not thus washed) they are before the throne of God (in the presence of His throne: seeing Him [Matt. v. 8; 1 Cor. xiii. 12] as He sees them), and they serve Him by day and by night ("this," says Bede, "is a way of expressing eternity in our human language") in His temple (as His priests, conducting the sweet praises of that heavenly choir, ver. 10, and doing what other high and blessed service He may delight to employ them in): and He that sitteth on the throne shall spread His habitation over them (it is exceedingly difficult to express the sense of these glorious words, in which the fulfilment of the Old Test. promises, such as Levit. xxvi.

11; Isa. iv. 5, 6; Ezek. xxxvii. 27, is announced. They give the fact of the dwelling of God among them, united with the fact of His protection being over them, and assuring to them the exemptions next to be mentioned. In the term shall tabernacle [so literally] are contained a multitude of recollections: of the pillar in the wilderness, of the Shechina in the holy place, of the tabernacle of witness with all its symbolism. These will all now be realized and superseded by the overshadowing presence of God Himself). They shall not hunger any more, nor yet (the repeated negative is exclusive, and carries a climax in each clause) thirst any more, neither shall the sun ever light upon them, no, nor any heat (as, e. g., the burning wind, the sirocco, which word is used in Isa. xlix. 10, from whence this whole sentence is taken): because the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne (the term in the midst of is somewhat difficult to express in its strict meaning. Probably, the two points required for estimating the position would be the two extreme ends of the throne to the right and to the left) shall tend them (as a shepherd his flock), and shall guide them to the fountains of the waters of life (see ch. xxii. 1, and Ps. xxiii. 2): and God shall wipe away every tear out of their eyes.

All is now ready for the final disclosure by the Lamb of the book of God's eternal purposes. The coming of the Lord has passed, and the elect are gathered in. Accordingly, THE LAST SEAL IS NOW OPENED, which lets loose the roll.

Cu. VIII. 1.] And when (or, whenever. This word occurs in the opening of this seal only, giving it an indefiniteness which does not belong to any of the rest. The touch is so slight as not to be reproducible in another language; but it can hardly be denied that in the Writer's mind it exists) he opened the seventh seal (what sign may we expect to follow? The other six seals have been accompanied each by its appropriate vision. Since the opening of the last one, followed as it was by the portents and terrors of the day of the Lord, there has been an episodic series of visions, setting forth the gathering in of the elect, and the innumerable multitude of the glorified Church. What incident is appropriate for the removal of this last, the only obstacle yet remaining to the entire disclosure of the secret purposes of God?) there was (there became, there came on, supervened, from a state very different, viz. the choral songs of the great multitude, re-echoed by the angelic host) silence in the heaven about half an hour (in enquiring into the meaning of this silence, let us first see whether we have any indication by analogy in the book itself, which may guide us. In ch. x. 4, when the Apostle is about to write down the voices of the seven thunders, he is commanded to abstain, and not to write them down. And though neither the manner nor the place of that withholding exactly corresponds to this half-hour's silence, yet it holds a place relating to the sounding of the seventh trumpet, quite sufficiently near to that of this, with regard to the seventh seal, to be brought into comparison with it. It imports 1) a passing over and withholding, as far as the Apostle is concerned, of that which the seventh seal revealed: i. e. of that complete unrolling of God's book of His eternal purposes, of the times and seasons which He holds in His own power. For this unrolling, every thing has been prepared: even to the taking off of the last seal which bound the mysterious roll. But as to what the roll itself contains, there is silence. 2) But it also imports, as Victorinus beautifully says, "that the half-hour is the beginning of eternal rest:" the commencement of that blessed sabbatical state of rest, during which the people of God shall be in full possession of those things which ear hath not heard nor eye seen. With equal truth and beauty does the same, our earliest apocalyptic expositor, proceed; "but he takes merely a part, because the interruption repeats the same things as far as order is concerned. For if the silence had been eternal, there would have been an end of narration." So that the vexed question, whether what follows belongs, or not, to the seventh seal, is, in fact, a question not worth seriously answering. Out of the completion of the former vision rise up a new series of visions, bearing a different character, but distinguished by the same number, indicating perfection, and shewing us that though evolved out of the completion of the former series, they do not belong to the last particular member of that series, any further than as it leads the way to them. Even more marked is this again below in ch. xi. —xvi., where the pouring out of the seven vials can in no way be said to belong to or form part of the blowing of the seventh trumpet. It will be seen then that I believe all interpretation to be wrong, which regards the blowing of the seven trumpets as forming a portion of the vision accompanying the seventh seal in particular: and again that I place in the same category all that which regards it as taking up and going over the same ground again. In the seven seals, we had revealed, as was fitting, the opening of the great Revelation, the progress and fortunes of God's Church and people in relation to the world, and of the world in relation to the church.

With regard to the trumpets themselves, we may observe, 1) That they repeat again the same mystic number seven, indicating that the course of events (see below) represented by this sounding is complete in itself, as was that indicated before by the breaking of the seals, and as is also that afterwards to be indicated by the pouring out of the vials: 2) That as in the case of the seals, there is a distinction made between the first four and the following three. Compare below, ver. 13. 3) That as also in the case of the seals, there is an interval, with two episodal visions, between the sixth and the seventh trumpet. Compare ch. x., and ch. xi. 1—14. 4) That of the trumpets, six only announce visions partaking of the common character of judgments, whereas the seventh forms, as we also saw in the case of the seventh seal, the solemn close to the rest. 5) And further, that as regards this seventh trumpet, the matters imported by it as being the third woe (ch. xi. 14) are not given, but merely indicated by "the time of the dead is come to be judged, &c." (ch. xi. 18): just as we saw that the things imported by the opening of the seventh seal were not detailed, but only indicated by the episodal visions, and by the nature of the similitude used. 6) That before the sounding of the seventh trumpet, the mystery of God is finished, as far as relates to the subject of this course of visions. This is indicated by the great Angel in ch. x. 7; and again by implication in ch. xi. 15—19, both by the purport of the voices in heaven, v. 15, and by the ascriptions of praise, vv. 16—18. This is the same again at the pouring out of the seventh vial, where the great voice from the throne announces "It is past," ch. xvi. 17: as we saw that it was at the opening of the seventh seal, as indicated by the silence of half an hour. Each course of visions is complete in itself: each course of visions ends in the accomplishment of that series of divine actions which it sets forth. 7) That as, when the preparation for the seven angels to sound their trumpets is evolved out of the opening of the seventh seal, the vision of the seals is solemnly closed in by "there were thunders and voices and lightnings and an earthquake," so the vision of the trumpets is solemnly closed in by "there were lightnings and voices and thunders and a great hail." That the similar occurrence, ch. xvi. 18, does not close the series of the vials, seems to be owing to special circumstances belonging to the outpouring of the seventh vial: see there (ch. xvi. 21). 8) That as in vv. 3—5, which form the close of the vision of the seals, and the opening of that of the trumpets, the offering of the prayers of the saints is the prominent feature (see notes below), so in the close of the series of the trumpets we have a prominent disclosure of the ark of the covenant of God, declaring and sealing His faithfulness to His Church. Similarly again at the beginning of the series of the vials, we have the temple of the tabernacle of witness opened. Why we have not a similar appearance at the close of that series, is to be accounted for as above. 9) That, seeing that this course of visions opens and closes as last noticed, it (to say nothing at present of the following series of the vials) is to be regarded as embracing a course of judgments (for such evidently is every one of its six visions) inflicted in answer to those prayers, and forming a portion of that avenging invoked by the souls of the martyrs in ch. vi. 10. 10) If this be so, then, as this series of visions is manifestly to be regarded as extending to the end of the whole period of time (compare ch. x. 7, "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he was about to blow his trumpet, and the mystery of God was finished," &c.), we may fairly say that it takes up the great world-wide vision of the seals at the point where it was said to the vengeance-invoking martyrs that "they should rest yet for a time:" and that the judgments of this series of visions occur during the time of waiting. This view is confirmed by finding that the dwellers on the earth, upon whom the vengeance is invoked in ch. vi. 10, are the objects of vengeance during this series of judgments, compare ver. 13. 11) In reference to this last remark, we may observe that no one portion especially of the earth's inhabitants are pointed out as objects of this series of judgments, but all the ungodly, as usurpers of the kingdom of Christ. This is plain, by the expressions in the ascription of praise with which it closes, I mean, the kingdom of this world, &c. Earthly domination is cast down, and the Lord's Kingdom is brought in. And it is also plain, from the expression used in that same ascription of praise, "and to destroy those that are destroying the earth," of what character have been these ungodly—the corrupters of the earth—the tainters and wasters of the means and accessories of life. 12) Whatever be the interpretation which follows from the foregoing considerations, two canons must not be violated. a) As in the case of the seals, so it is manifest here, from ch. xi. 18, "the time of the dead to be judged is come," that the series of visions reaches forward to the time of the end, and is only terminated by the great events indicated in those words. And b) as yet, no particular city, no especial people is designated as the subject of the apocalyptic vision. All is general. The earth, the trees, the grass, the sea, the waters, the lights of heaven, mankind,—these are at present the objects in our field of view. There is as yet no throne of the beast, as in the outpouring of the vials, ch. xvi. 10. The prophecy goes on becoming more specific as it advances: and it is not for us to anticipate its course, nor to localize and individualize where it is as yet general and undefined. The further details will be treated as we go on).

2.] First appearance of the seven trumpet-angels. And I saw (viz. during the symbolic silence, at the end of the half-hour. What now follows is not to be considered as in the interpretation chronologically consequent upon that which was indicated by the seals, but merely as in the vision chronologically consequent on that course of visions. The evolution of the courses of visions out of one another does not legitimately lead to the conclusion that the events represented by them are consecutive in order of time. There are other and more important sequences than that of time: they may be independent of it, or they may concur with it) the seven angels which stand before God (compare Tobit xii. 15, "I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels, which present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before [more properly, enter in before] the glory of the Holy One." The agreement is not entire, inasmuch as here another angel, and not one of the seven, presently offers the prayers of the saints. These are not the archangels, nor are they the seven spirits of ch. iv. 5: nor again are they merely seven angels selected on account of the seven trumpets: this is entirely precluded by the article, the seven angels which stand, &c. It is clear that the passage in Tobit and the words here refer to the same matter, and that the fact was part of that revelation with regard to the order and employments of the holy angels, which seems to have taken place during the captivity), and there were given to them seven trumpets (understand, with intent that they themselves should blow them). And another angel (not to be identified with Christ, as is done by Bede, Vitringa, Calovius, and others, and recently [for doctrinal reasons] by Elliott: for thus confusion is introduced into the whole imagery of the vision, in which the Lord Jesus is otherwise present, viz., as the Lamb in the midst of the throne. In ch. v. 8, we have the twenty-four elders falling down with vials containing the prayers of the saints: here we have an angel offering incense that it may mingle with the prayers on the heavenly altar. Any theological difficulty which belongs to the one belongs also to the other; and it is a canon which we must strictly observe in interpretation, that we are not, on account of any supposed doctrinal propriety, to depart from the plain meaning of words. In ch. vii. 2 we have "another angel" in the sense of a created angel [see note there]; and would it be probable that St. John would after this, and I may add with his constant usage of the term throughout the book for angel in its ordinary sense, designate our Lord by this title? There is something to me far more revolting from theological propriety in such a supposition, than in an angel being seen in the heavenly ministrations offering incense to mix with the prayers of the saints. It ought really to be needless to remark, in thus advocating consistency of verbal interpretation, that no countenance is hereby given to the invocation of angels: the whole truth of their being and ministration protesting against such an inference. They are simply ministering spirits, and the action here described is a portion of that their ministry. Through Whom the prayers are offered, we all know. He is our only Mediator and channel of grace) came and stood over (so that his form appeared above it; the altar being between the Apostle and him) the altar (viz. the altar named ch. vi. 9, as the repetition of the word with the article shews:

see below on ver. 5), having a golden censer (the word used signifies elsewhere the frankincense itself. But here it unquestionably means a censer; see below, ver. 5, where the word is the same. No argument can be derived from the censer being a golden one. The spirit of the heavenly imagery will account for this without going further: we have, throughout, crowns [iv. 4], incense-vials [v. 8], vengeance-vials, [xv. 7], girdles [xv. 6], a measuring-reed [xxi. 15], &c., all of the same costly metal). And there was given to him (viz. by divine appointment, through those ministering: not, by the saints who offered the prayers, for two reasons: 1) because the incense is mentioned as something distinct from the prayers of the saints; see below: 2) because no forcing of the expression, there was given unto him, will extract this meaning from it. It is a frequent apocalyptic formula in reference to those things or instruments with which, or actions by which, the ministrations necessary to the progress of the visions are performed: compare ch. vi. 2, 4 [twice], 8, 11, vii. 2, viii. 2, ix. 1, &c.) much incense (see ch. v. 8, and on the difference of the imagery, below), that he might give it to (so literally: various renderings and supplyings of the construction have been devised: but the simple dative after "give it" appears the only legitimate one: and the sense as expressed by Calovius, "that he might add it to the prayers of the saints, and so make them prayers of sweet savour." The object was, to incense the prayers of the Saints: on the import, see below) the prayers of all the saints (not only now of those martyred ones in ch. vi. 9: the trumpets which follow are in answer to the whole prayers of God's church. The martyrs' cry for vengeance is the loudest note, but all join) upon (the preposition in the original carries the idea of motion with it; which thus incensed were offered on the golden altar, &c. From what follows it would seem that the prayers were already before God: see below) the altar of gold which was before the throne (this may be a different altar from that over which the angel was standing; or it may be the same further specified. The latter alternative seems the more probable. We must not imagine that we have in these visions a counterpart of the Jewish tabernacle, or attempt to force the details into accordance with its arrangements. No such correspondence has been satisfactorily made out: indeed to assume such here would be perhaps inconsistent with ch. xi. 19, where first the temple of God in heaven is opened. A general analogy, in the use and character of the heavenly furniture, is all that we can look for). And the smoke of the incense ascended to (such again seems to be the only legitimate rendering of the dative in the original. The common one, "with," cannot be justified. The prayers, being already offered, received the smoke of the incense. The whole imagery introduces the fact that those prayers are about to be answered in the following judgments) the prayers of the saints out of the hand of the angel, before God (notice, that no countenance is given by this vision to the idea of angelic intercession. The angel is simply a minister. The incense [importing here, we may perhaps say, acceptability owing to the ripeness of the season in the divine purposes, so that the prayers, lying unanswered before, become, by the fulness of the time, acceptable as regards an immediate reply] is given to him: he merely wafts the incense up, so that it mingles with the prayers. Düsterdieck well remarks, that the angel, in performing sacerdotal offices, is but a fellow-servant of the saints [ch. xix. 10], who are them-

All these immediate consequences of the casting down of the hot ashes on the earth are the symbolic precursors of the divine judgments about to be inflicted).

One point must here be noticed: the intimate connexion between the act of this incense-offering angel and the seven trumpets which follow. It belongs to them all; it takes place when now the seven angels have had their trumpets given them, and this series of visions is introduced. So that every interpretation must take this into account: remembering that the judgments which follow are answers to the prayers of the saints, and are inflicted on the enemies of the church.

7—12.] The first four trumpets. It has been before observed, that as in the case of the seals, so here, the first four are marked off from the last three. The distinction is here made, not only, as there, by an intrinsic feature running through the four, but by the voice of the eagle in ver. 13, introducing those latter trumpets and giving them also a distinguishing feature. And as we there maintained [see note on ch. vi. 8.] that any interpretation, to be right, must take into account this difference between the four and the three, so here also. But in order to the taking into account of this difference, we must gain some approximate idea of its import. Does the intrinsic feature, common to these four plagues, bear a general interpretation which will suit their character as distinguished from the other three? I imagine it does. For, whereas each of those three [or rather of the former two of them, for, as has been observed, the seventh forms the solemn conclusion to the whole] evolves a course of plagues including separate and independent details, these four are connected and interdependent. Their common feature is destruction and corruption: not total, it is true, but partial: in each case to the amount expressed by the third part: but this fractional extent of action appears again under the sixth trumpet, ch. ix. 15, 18, and therefore clearly must not be pressed as carrying the distinctive character of the first four (on its import see note below, ver. 7). It is in the kind of exercise which their agency finds, that these four trumpets are especially distinguished. The plagues indicated by them are entirely inflicted on natural objects: the earth, trees, grass, sea, rivers, lights of heaven: whereas those indicated by the two latter are expressly said to be inflicted on men, and not on natural objects: compare ch. ix. 4, 15. Surely, however those natural objects are in each case to be understood, this is a point not lightly to be passed over. Nor can it fail to strike every unprejudiced student, that we must not, as is done by many expositors, interpret the earth and grass and trees as signifying nations and men in the former portion of the series of visions, and then, when the distinction between these and men is made in the latter part, be content with the literal meaning. With every allowance for the indisputable intermixture, in many places, of literal and allegorical meanings, all analogy requires that in the same series of visions, when one judgment is to destroy earth, trees, and grass, and another not to injure earth, trees, or grass, but men only, the earth, trees, and grass should bear the same meaning in the two cases. We may fairly say then, that the plagues of the four former trumpets affect the accessories of life—the earth, the trees, the green grass, the waters as means of transit and of subsistence, the lights of heaven:—whereas those of the last two affect life itself, the former by the infliction of pain, the latter of death.

A certain analogy may be noticed, but not a very close one, between these plagues and those in Egypt of old. The analogy is not close, for the order is not the same, nor are all particulars contained in the one series which are contained in the other: but the resemblance is far too striking to pass without remark. We have the hail and fire, the water turned to blood, the darkness, the locusts[, the infliction of death]: five, in fact, if not six, out of the ten. The Egyptian plagues are beyond doubt remembered in the sacred imagery, if they are not reproduced.

The secret of interpretation here I believe to be this: The whole seven trumpets bring before us the punishment of the enemies of God during the period indicated by their course. These punishments are not merely direct inflictions of plagues, but consist in great part of that judicial retribution on them that know not God, which arises from their own depravity, and in which their own sins are made to punish themselves. This kind of punishment comes before us especially in the four first trumpet-visions. The various natural accessories of life are ravaged, or are turned to poison. In the first, the earth and its produce are ravaged with fire: in the second, the sea is mingled with blood, and ships, which should have been for men's convenience, are destroyed. In the third, the waters and springs, the essential refreshments of life, are poisoned, and death is occasioned by drinking of them. In the fourth, the natural lights of heaven are darkened. So that I regard these first four trumpets as setting forth the gradual subjugation of the earth to Him whose kingdom it is in the end to become, by judgments inflicted on the ungodly, as regards the vitiating and destroying the ordinary means of subsistence, and comfort, and knowledge. In the details of these judgments, as also of the two following, there are many particulars which I cannot interpret, and with regard to which it may be a question whether they are to be considered as other than belonging to the requisite symbolic machinery of the prophecy. But in confessing this I must also say, that I have never seen, in any apocalyptic Commentator, an interpretation of these details at all approaching to verisimilitude: never any which is not obliged to force the plain sense of words, or the certain course of history, to make them fit the requisite theory. Many examples of these will be found in the history of apocalyptic interpretation given by Mr. Elliott in vol. iv. of his Horæ Apocalypticae.

7.] And the first blew his trumpet, and there took place hail and fire mingled in blood (i.e. the hail and the fire were mingled together in blood, as their flux or vehicle; the stones of hail and the balls of fire [not lightning] fell in a shower of blood, just as hail and fireballs commonly fall in a shower of rain. There is here manifestly an allusion to the plague of hail in Egypt, of which it is said that "the fire ran along upon the ground:" "there was hail and fire mingled with the hail," Exod. ix. 24: but with the addition of the blood. With regard to this latter, we may remark, that both here and under the vials, where the earth, seas, and rivers are again the objects of the first three judgments, blood is a feature common to all three. It appears rather to indicate a general character of the judgments, than to require any special interpretation in each particular case. In blood is life: in the shedding, or in the appearing, of blood, is implied the destruction of life, with which, as a consequence, all these judgments must be accompanied), and it was cast into the earth (towards the surface of the earth): and the third part (this expression first occurring here, it will be well once for all to enquire into its meaning in these prophecies. I may first say, that all special interpretations seem to me utterly to have failed; e.g. that of Elliott, which would understand it of a tripartite division of the Roman Empire at the time to which he assigns this judgment. It is fatal to this whole class of interpretations, that it is not said the hail &c. were cast on a third part, but that the destruction occasioned by them extended to a third part of the earth on which they were cast. And this is most expressly declared to be so in this first case, by all green grass being also destroyed, not a third part: a fact of which this interpretation takes no notice. It is this mixture of the fractional third with other designations of extent of mischief, which will lead us I believe to the right interpretation. We find it again under the third trumpet, where the star Wormwood is cast "on the third part of the rivers, and on the springs of the waters:" the result being that the third part of the waters was embittered. This lax usage would of itself lead us to suppose that we are not to look for strict definiteness in the interpretation. And if we refer to the prophecy in Zech. xiii. 7 ff., where the import is to announce judgment on a greater part and the escape of a remnant, we find the same tripartite division: "And it shall come to pass, that in all the land, saith the Lord, two parts therein shall be cut off and die, but the third shall be left therein. And I will bring the third part through the fire, &c." Nay, in the Apocalypse itself, we have the third part used where the sense can hardly but be similarly indefinite: e.g., under the sixth trumpet, ch. ix. 15, 18, and xii. 4, where it is said that the dragon's tail "draweth the third part of the stars of heaven:" the use of the present shewing that it is rather a general power, than a particular event which is designated. Compare again the use of "the fourth part of the earth," in ch. vi. 8, and of "the tenth part of the city," in ch. xi. 13. All these seem to shew, that such prophetic expressions are to be taken rather in their import as to amount, than in any strict fractional division. Here, for instance, I would take the pervading third part as signifying, that though the judgment is undoubtedly, as to extent, fearful and sweeping, yet that God in inflicting it, spares more than he smites: two-thirds escape in each case, while one is smitten) of the earth (i. e. plainly of the surface of the earth, and that, of the cultivated soil, which admitted of such a devastation) was burnt up (so that the fire prevails in the plague, not the hail nor the blood), and the third part of the trees (in all the earth, not in the third part) was burnt up, and all green grass (upon earth: no longer a third part: possibly because green grass would first and unavoidably every where scorch up at the approach of such a plague, whereas the hardier crops and trees might partially escape) was burnt up.

8.] And the second angel blew his trumpet: and as it were a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea (first, by the as it were, that which was cast into the sea was not a mountain, but only a burning mass so large as to look like one. Then, it was this mass itself, not any thing proceeding from it, which was cast down. So that the introduction of a volcano into the imagery is quite unjustifiable. In the language [hardly in the sense] there seems to be a reminiscence of Jer. li. 25, "I will make thee a burnt mountain." It is remarkable that there the mountain should be characterized as "O destroying mountain . . . which destroyest all the earth." compare our ch. xi. 18): and the third part of the sea became blood (so in the Egyptian plague the Nile and all the Egyptian waters. By the non-consequence of the result of the fiery mass falling into the sea is again represented to us that in the infliction of this plague from above, the instrument of it is merely described as it appeared (as it were), not as it really was. So that all ideas imported into the interpretation which take the mountain, or the fiery character of it, as elements in the symbolism, are departures from the real intent of the description): and the third part of the creatures [that were] in the sea (not, as Elliott, "in the third part of the sea," but in the whole. Nor again must we stretch the words "in the sea" to mean the maritime coasts, nor the islands, nor the transmarine provinces: a usage not even shewn to exist by the examples cited by him) died (compare Exod. vii. 17—21), those which have life (animal souls), and the third part of the ships were destroyed (another inconsequent result, and teaching us as before.

We may remark, at the end of this second trumpet, that the judgments inflicted by these first two are distinctly those which in ch. vii. 3 were held back until the servants of God were sealed: "Hurt not the earth, nor the sea, nor the trees, until we have sealed, &c." So that, as before generally remarked, the place of these trumpet-plagues must be sought after that sealing; and consequently [see there] in very close conjunction with the day of the Lord itself).

10.] And the third angel blew his trumpet, and there fell from heaven a great star burning as a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers and upon the fountains of the waters (it can hardly be said, as Düsterdieck, that we are here as matter of course to understand, on the third part of the fountains, any more than we are to limit "all green grass" in ver. 7 to all the grass within the third part of the earth). And the name of the star is called Wormwood (in the original, Apsinthos. The medicinal use of the plant was known to the ancients), and the third part of the waters became (was turned into) wormwood: and many [of the] men (who dwelt by these waters: such may be the force of the art. But the expression may be general: many men) died from the waters, because they were embittered (compare the converse history, Exod. xv. 23 ff., of the bitter waters being made sweet by casting a certain tree into them. See also 2 Kings ii. 19 ff. The question whether wormwood was a deadly poison or not, is out of place here. It is not said that all who drank, died. And the effect of any bitter drug, however medicinally valuable, being mixed with the water ordinarily used, would be to occasion sickness and death. It is hardly possible to read of this third plague, and not to think of the deadly effect of those strong spirituous drinks which are in fact water turned into poison. The very name absinthe is not unknown in their nomenclature: and there is no effect which could be so aptly described by the falling of fire into water, as this, which results in ardent spirit,—in that which the simple islanders of the South Sea call firewater. That this plague may go on to destroy even this fearful proportion of the ungodly in the latter days, is far from impossible, considering its prevalence even now in some parts of the civilized world. But I mention this rather as an illustration, than as an interpretation). And the fourth angel blew his trumpet: and the third part of the sun was struck (it is not said, as in the case of the former three trumpets, with what. And this absence of an instrument in the fourth of these correlative visions perhaps teaches us not to attribute too much import to the instruments by which the previous ones are brought about. It is the stroke itself, not its instrument, on which attention should be directed) and the third part of the moon and the third part of the stars, that the third part of them might be darkened, and the day might not shine during the third part of it (the limitation of the third part is now manifestly to time, not to brightness. So A. V. rightly, "for a third part of it." That this consequence is no natural one following upon the obscuration of a third portion of the sun, &c., is not to be alleged as any objection, but belongs to the altogether supernatural region in which these visions are situated. Thus we have a globe of fire turning seawater to blood—a burning star embittering the waters: &c.), and the night in like manner (i. e. the night as far as she is, by virtue of the moon and stars, a time

This may carry meaning—a single or solitary eagle,—as might also be the case in ch. xviii. 21, see there) eagle (hardly to be identified with the eagles of Matt. xxiv. 28: for 1) that saying is more proverbial than prophetic: and 2) any application of that saying would be far more aptly reserved for our ch. xix. 17. Nor again is the eagle a bird of ill omen, as Ewald says: nor a contrast to the dove in John i. 32, as Hengstenberg: but far more probably the symbol of judgment and vengeance rushing to its prey, as in Deut. xxviii. 49; Hos. viii. 1; Hab. i. 8. Nor again is it to be understood as an angel in eagle's shape: but a veritable eagle in the vision. Thus we have the altar speaking, ch. xvi. 7) flying in mid-heaven (i. e. in the south or noon-day sky, where the sun reaches the meridian. So that the word does not signify the space intermediate between heaven and earth, but as above. And the eagle flies there, to be seen and heard of all. I may also notice that the whole expression favours the true reading, eagle, as against the substituted "angel"), saying with a loud voice, Woe, woe, woe, to those that dwell upon the earth (the objects of the vengeance invoked in the prayers of the martyrs, ch. vi. 10: the ungodly world, as distinguished from the church) by reason of the remaining voices of the trumpet (the singular is used generically: the three voices all having this common to them, that they are the sound of a trumpet) of the three angels who are about to blow.

trumpets. These, as well as the first four, have a character of their own, corresponding in some measure to that of the visions at the opening of the three last seals. The particulars related under them are separate and detailed, not symmetrical and correspondent. And as in the seals, so here, the seventh forms rather the solemn conclusion to the whole, than a distinct judgment of itself. Here also, as there, it is introduced by two episodal passages, having reference to the visions which are to follow, and which take up the thread of prophecy again at a period previous to things detailed before.

1—12.] The fifth, or first Woe trumpet. And the fifth angel blew his trumpet, and I saw a star fallen (not, as A. V. fall, which gives an entirely wrong view of the transactions of the vision. The star had fallen before, and is first seen as thus fallen) out of heaven to the earth (the reader will at once think on Isa. xiv. 12, "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" And on Luke x. 18, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven." And, doubtless, as the personal import of this star is made clear in the following words, such is the reference here. We may also notice that this expression forms a connecting link to another place, ch. xii. 9, in this book, where Satan is represented as cast out of heaven to the earth: see notes there. It is hardly possible, with some Commentators, to understand a good angel by this fallen star. His description, as well as his work, corresponds only to an agent of evil. Andreas is obliged to distort words to bring in this view: "descended upon earth; for this is meant by fallen," is enough to condemn any interpretation), and there was given to him (was given, as usual, for the purpose of the part which he is to bear in the vision) the key of the pit of the abyss (viz. of hell, which in the vision is a vast profundity opening by a pit or shaft upon the surface of the earth, imagined as shut down by a cover, and locked. This abyss is in the Apocalypse the habitation of the devil and his angels: compare ver. 11, ch. xx. 1, 3: see also ch. xi. 7, xvii. 8. See further in note on ch. xx. 10), and he opened the pit of the abyss, and there went up smoke from the pit as smoke of a great furnace (see Gen. xix. 28), and the sun was darkened and the air (not meaning, the air inasmuch as it receives its light from the sun: for the sun may be obscured, as by a cloud, without the air being darkened) by reason of the smoke of the pit. And out of the smoke (which therefore was their vehicle or envelope) came forth locusts into (towards, over, so as to spread over: it gives more the sense of distribution than "upon" would) the earth, and there was given to them power as the scorpions of the earth (not as noting any distinction between land and water-scorpions, as Ewald, but because the scorpions are natural and of the earth, whereas these locusts are infernal and not of nature) have power (viz. to sting, as below explained): and it was commanded them that they shall not hurt the grass of the earth, nor yet every (i. e. any) green thing, nor yet every (any) tree (the usual objects on which locusts prey: compare Exod. x. 13, 15), but only (literally, except: the former sentence being regarded as if it had run, "that they should hurt nothing,"—and then "except" follows naturally) the men, the which (so literally: it designates the class or kind) have not the seal of God upon their foreheads (this, as before noticed, fixes this fifth trumpet to the time following the sealing in ch. vii. It denotes a plague which falls on the unbelieving inhabitants of the earth after the servants of God have been marked out among them, and of which the saints are not partakers. Either then it denotes something purely spiritual, some misery from which those are exempt who have peace with God,—which can hardly be, consistently with vv. 5, 6,—or it takes place in a state totally different from this present one, in which the wheat and tares are mingled together. One or other of these considerations will at once dismiss by far the greater number of interpretations. The fact of Mahomet's mission being avowedly against corrupt Christianity as idolatry, does not in the remotest degree answer the conditions. In the very midst of this corrupt Christianity were at that time God's elect scattered up and down: and it is surely too much to say that every such person escaped scathless from the Turkish sword). the limitation than the extension of the grant) that they should not kill them (the unsealed; the subject is changed) shall be tormented five months (the reason seems to be correct, which several Commentators have given for this number being chosen: viz., that five months is the ordinary time in the year during which locusts commit their ravages. At all events we are thus in some measure delivered from the endless perplexities of capricious fancy in which the historical interpreters involve us): and their torment (i. e. that of the sufferers) is as the torment of (arising from) a scorpion, when it has smitten (by its bite or sting) a man. And in those days men shall seek death (observe the transition of the style from the descriptive to the prophetic. For the first time the Apostle ceases to be the exponent of what he saw, and becomes the direct organ of the Spirit), and shall not find it; and they shall vehemently desire (desire alone is not strong enough) to die, and death fleeth (the pres., of the habitual avoidance in those days) from them (the longing to die arises from the excruciating pain of the sting. See Jer. viii. 3.

I cannot forbear noticing as we pass, the caprice of historical interpreters. On the command not to kill the men, &c., in ver. 5, our principal modern historical interpreter says, "i. e. not to annihilate them as a political Christian body." If then the same rule of interpretation is to hold, the present verse must mean that the "political Christian body" will be so sorely beset by these Mahometan locusts, that it will vehemently desire to be annihilated, and not find any way. For it surely cannot be allowed that the killing of men should be said of their annihilation as a political body in one verse, and their desiring to die in the next should be said of something totally different, and applicable to their individual misery).

7.] The Apostle now returns to the description of the locusts themselves. And the shapes of the locusts [were] like horses made ready for war (this resemblance,—compare Joel ii. 4, "the appearance of them is as the appearance of horses,"—has been noticed by travellers. Ewald remarks that one German name for the grasshopper is Heu-pferd, the grass-horse. And especially does the likeness hold good when the horse is equipped for war; the plates of the horse's armour being represented by the hard laminae of the outer shell of the locust: see below, ver. 9), and on their heads as it were crowns like unto gold (it is not easy to say what this part of the description imports. An attempt has been made to apply it to the turban: but granting some latitude to the word crowns, like gold will hardly bear this. The appearance of a turban, even when ornamented with gold, is hardly golden. I should understand the words, of the head actually ending in a crown-shaped fillet which resembled gold in its material, just as the wings of some of the beetle tribe might be said to blaze with gold and gems. So we have below, "they had breastplates as it were breastplates of iron:" the material not being metallic, but only as it were metallic. Some understand these crowns of soldiers' helmets: but this is quite arbitrary and gratuitous): and their faces [were] as the faces of men (Düsterdieck well observes, that we must not suppose them actually to have had human faces, but that the face of the locust, which under ordinary circumstances has a distant resemblance to the human countenance, bore this resemblance even more notably in the case of these supernatural locusts. It is not their faces were the faces of men, but, "were as the faces of men." Nor again can we agree with the idea that men is here used to designate the male sex: an interpretation recommended here,—the general word in the original importing both sexes,—by the wish to introduce the moustache of the Arabs. It is much more natural to take the general term in its usual and wider meaning:—their faces were like human faces: and then comes the limitation, not in the face, but in another particular), and they had hair as the hair of women (i.e. long and flowing, 1 Cor. xi. 14 f. De Wette quotes from Niebuhr an Arabic proverb in which the antlers of locusts are compared to the hair of girls. But perhaps we must regard the comparison as rather belonging to the supernatural portion of our description. Ewald would understand the hair on the legs, or on the bodies, of the locusts, to be meant, referring to rough caterpillars, Jer. li. 27. To infer, from this feature, licentiousness as a characteristic in the interpretation, is entirely beside the purpose): and their teeth were as the teeth of lions (so also of the locust in Joel i. 6. Ewald rightly designates as very doubtful a fancied resemblance to a lion in the under jaw. We may observe that this, as some other features in the description, is purely graphic, and does not in any way apply to the plague to be inflicted by these mystic locusts), and they had breastplates as iron breastplates (the plate which forms the thorax of the natural locust, was in their case as if of iron), and the sound of their wings [was] as a sound of chariots of many horses (by the two genitives the sound of both, the chariots and the horses, is included. The chariots are regarded as an appendage to the horses) as they run to war. And they have tails like to scorpions (i.e. to the tails of scorpions), and stings (viz. in their tails: this is the particular especially in which the comparison finds its aptitude): and in their tails is their power to hurt men five months (see above on ver. 5). They have as king over them (or, "they have a king over them, viz." . . . It favours this last alternative, that in this particular, of having a king, they are distinguished from natural locusts: for Prov. xxx. 27, "the locusts have no king") the angel of the abyss; his name is in Hebrew Abaddon (i.e., perdition; used in the Old Test. for the place of perdition, Orcus, in Job xxvi. 6; Prov. xxvii. 20, in both of which places it is joined with Hades (Sheol),—Ps. lxxxviii. 12; Job xxviii. 22. It is a question, who this angel of the abyss is. Perhaps, for accurate distinction's sake, we must not identify him with Satan himself,—compare ch. xii. 3, 9,—but must regard him as one of the principal of the bad angels). The one (first) woe hath passed: behold, there cometh (singular, the verb applying simply to that which is future, without reference as yet to that of its plurality) two woes after these things.

There is an endless Babel of allegorical and historical interpretation of these locusts from the pit. The most that we can say of their import is, that they belong to a series of judgments on the ungodly which will immediately precede the second advent of our Lord: that the various and mysterious particulars of the vision will no doubt clear themselves up to the church of God, when the time of its fulfilment arrives: but that no such clearing up has yet taken place, a very few hours of research among histories of apocalyptic interpretation will serve to convince any reader who is not himself the servant of a preconceived system.

13—21.] The sixth Trumpet. And the sixth angel blew his trumpet, and I heard a voice (literally, one voice: but it is doubtful, in the uncertain authenticity of the word four, whether any stress is to be laid on this one or not. Vitringa gives it the emphasis,—"that the four horns simultaneously uttered, not a diverse, but one and the same voice:" and so Hengstenberg. The allegorical interpreters give it various imports—the agreement of the four Gospels,—that of the prayers of exiled Jews, &c.) out of the [four] horns of the golden altar which was before God

(the same altar as that previously mentioned in ch. viii. 3 and vi. 9, where see notes. From ch. xvi. 7 it would appear that the voice probably proceeded from the altar itself, represented as uttering the cry of vengeance for the blood shed on it; compare ch. vi. 9, with which cry of the martyred saints the whole series of retributive judgments is connected. The reading of the Sinaitic MS. [see margin] is very remarkable, and may represent the original text. To suppose that the cry from the altar is indicative of an altar having been the scene of some special sin on the part of the men of Roman Christendom, and so to apply it to the perversions of Christian rites in the Romish Church, is surely to confuse the whole imagery of the vision. For it is not of any altar in the abstract that we are reading, but of the golden altar which was before God, where the prayers of the saints had been offered by the angel, ch. viii. 3, 5: and the voice is the result of those prayers, in accordance with which those judgments are inflicted.

The horns again, representing the eneeinte of the altar, not any special rites with which the horns of an altar were concerned, cannot be pressed into the service of the above-noticed interpretation, but simply belong to the propriety of that heard and seen. The voice proceeded from the surface of the altar, on which the prayers had been offered: and that surface was bounded by the (horns) saying to the sixth angel, who had the trumpet (viz. that one now before us,—belonging to the present vision), Loose (it is too much to say that the angel himself is made the active minister of this loosing: we do not read "and he went and loosed" following, but simply "and the four angels, &c. were loosed." We must therefore believe that the command is given to him only in so far as he is the representative and herald of all that takes place under his trumpet-blowing) the four

angels which are bound (so A. V. rightly: "are bound" is the true perfect passive, not "have been bound") on (not "in," as A. V.) the great river Euphrates (the whole imagery here has been a crux of the interpreters: as to who these angels are, and what is indicated by the locality here described. I will only venture to point out, amidst the surging tumult of controversy, one or two points of apparent refuge to which we must not betake ourselves. First, we must not yield to the temptation, so attractive at first sight, of identifying these four angels with the four angels standing on the four corners of the earth and holding in the four winds, in ch. vii. 1 ff. For the mission of these angels is totally distinct from theirs, as the locality is also. There is not a syllable of winds here, nor any hurting of earth, sea, or trees. Secondly, the question need not perplex us here, whether these are good or bad angels: for it does not enter in any way into consideration. They simply appear, as in other parts of this book, as ministers of the divine purposes, and pass out of view as soon as mentioned. Here, it would almost seem as if the angelic persons were little more than personifications: for they are immediately resolved into the host of cavalry. Thirdly, that there is nothing in the text to prevent "the great river Euphrates" from being meant literally. Düsterdieck maintains, that because the rest of the vision has a mystical meaning, therefore this local designation must have one also: and that if we are to take the Euphrates literally and the rest mystically, endless confusion would be introduced. But this is quite a mistake, as the slightest consideration will shew. It is a common practice in Scripture allegory to intermingle with its mystic language literal designations of time and place. Take for instance the allegory in Ps. lxxx. 8, 11, "Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt . . . it sent out its boughs unto the sea, and its branches unto the river:" where, though the vine and its boughs and branches are mystical, Egypt, the sea, and the river, are all literal. See some good remarks on this in Mr. Elliott's 1st vol., p. 331 ff., where the above example is cited among others). And the four angels were loosed, which had been prepared against (in reference to) the hour and day and month and year (viz. which had been appointed by God: the appointed hour occurring in the appointed day, and that in the appointed month, and that in the appointed year. The article the, prefixed, and not repeated, seems to make this meaning imperative. Had the article been repeated before each, the ideas of the appointed hour, day, month, and year would have been separated, not, as now, united: had there been no article, we might have understood that the four were to be added together to make up the time, though even thus the "against" occurring once only would have made some difficulty), that they should kill the third part of men (on the third part, see above, ver. 7. It seems necessary, that in this term, men, we are to include only the "dwellers on the earth" of ch. viii. 13, not any of the servants of God); and the number of the armies of the cavalry was twice myriads of myriads (i. e. 20,000 × 10,000: = 200,000,000, two hundred millions. The number seems to be founded on those in Ps. lxxviii. 17, Dan. vii. 10); —I heard the number of them. And after this manner (i. e. according to

The armour of both was uniform) breastplates red, as fire (the three epithets express the colours of the breastplates, and are to be separated, as belonging each to one portion of the host, and corresponding to the fire, smoke, and brimstone which proceeded out of the horses' mouths below), and blue, as smoke (literally, hyacinthine. The hyacinth of the Greeks is supposed to have been our dark blue iris), and yellow, as brimstone (light yellow: such a colour as would be produced by the settling fumes of brimstone): and the heads of the horses (the horses are taken up again, both horses and riders having been treated of in the preceding sentence) [were] as heads of lions, and out of their mouths goeth forth fire and smoke and brimstone (i.e. separately, one of these out of the mouths of each division of the host. It is remarkable, that these divisions are three, though the angels were four). From (indicates not directly the instrumentality, but the direction from which the result comes) these three plagues were killed the third part of men, by the fire and the smoke and the brimstone which goeth forth out of their mouths. For the power of the horses is in their mouth (principally; seeing that by what proceeded from their mouth their mission, to slay the third part of men, was accomplished) and in their tails: for their tails were like serpents, having heads, and with them they hurt (i.e. inflict pain: viz. with the bites of the serpent heads in which they terminate.

I cannot but mention, in no unfriendly spirit, but because, both being friends, Truth is the dearer, that which may be designated the culminating instance of incongruous interpretation in the modern English historical exposition of these prophecies. These tails are, according to the Commentator, the horse-tails, borne as symbols of authority by the Turkish Pachas. Well may Mr. Barker say [Friendly Strictures, p. 32], "an interpretation so wild, if it refutes not itself, seems scarcely capable of refutation." Happily, it does refute itself. For it is convicted, by altogether leaving out of view the power in the mouths, which is the principal feature in the original vision: by making no reference to the serpent-like character of these tails, but being wholly inconsistent with it: by distorting the canon of symmetrical interpretation in making the heads attached to the tails to mean that the tails are symbols of authority: and by being compelled to render instead of they hurt, "they commit injustice," a meaning which, in this reference, the word will not bear. When it is said of fire- and smoke- and brimstone-breathing horses which kill the third part of men, that besides having power in their mouths they have it in their tails, which

I will venture to say, that a more self-condemnatory interpretation was never broached than this of the horsetails of the Pachas). And the rest of men (this specification which follows clearly shews what sort of men are meant: viz. the ungodly alone) who were not killed by (literally, in: i. e. the course of) these plagues, did not even repent of (literally, out of: so as to come out from) the works of their hands (i. e. as the context here necessitates, not, the whole course of their lives, but the idols which their hands had made. This will at once appear on comparing our passage with Deut. iv. 28, and Ps. cxxxv. 15. See also Acts vii. 44) that they should not (in order not to) worship devils (see 1 Cor. x. 20; 1 Tim. iv. 1, and notes there. The objects of worship of the heathen, and of semi-heathen Christians, are in fact devils, by whatever name they may be called), and images of gold and of silver and of brass and of stone and of wood, which can neither see nor hear nor walk: and they did not repent of their murders nor of their witchcrafts (literally, their drugs: concrete in sense of abstract) nor of their fornication nor of their thefts. The character of these sins points out very plainly who are the sufferers by this sixth, or second woe trumpet, and the survivors who do not repent. We are taught by St. Paul that the heathen are without excuse for degrading the majesty of God into an image made like unto corruptible things, and for degenerating into gross immoralities in spite of God's testimony given through the natural conscience. And even thus will the heathen world continue in the main until the second advent of our Lord, of which these judgments are to be the immediate precursors. Nor will these terrible inflictions themselves bring those to repentance, who shall ultimately reject the Gospel which shall be preached among all nations. Whether, or how far, those Christians who have fallen back into these sins of the heathen, are here included, is a question not easy to decide. That they are not formally in the Apostle's view, seems clear. We are not yet dealing with the apostasy and fornication within the church herself. But that they, having become as the dwellers upon the earth, even so far as to inherit their character of persecutors of the saints, may by the very nature of the case, be individually included in the suffering of these plagues,—just as we believe and trust that many individually belonging to Babylon may be found among God's elect,—it is of course impossible to deny.

CH. X. 1—XI. 14.] EPISODICAL AND ANTICIPATORY. As after the sixth seal, so here after the sixth trumpet, we have a passage interposed, containing two episodes, completing that which has been already detailed, and introducing the final member of the current series. But it is not so easy here as there, to ascertain the relevance and force of the episodes. Their subjects here seem further off: their action more complicated. In order to appreciate them, it will be necessary to lay down clearly the point at which we have arrived, and to observe what is at that point required.

The last vision witnessed the destruction of a third part of the ungodly by the horsemen from the East, and left the remainder in a state of impenitent idolatry and sin. Manifestly then the prayers of the saints are not yet answered, however near the time may be for that answer. If then this Episode contains some assurance of the approach of that answer in its completeness, it will be what we might expect at this point in the series of visions.

At the same time, looking onwards to the rest of the book, we see, that as out of the more general series of visions at the opening of the seals, affecting both the church and the world, there sprung a new and more particular series of the trumpets, having reference to one incident in the former vision, and affecting especially the "inhabitants of the earth," so if now the gaze of prophecy once more turns to the church and her fortunes, and the Apostle receives a new commission to utter a second series of prophecies, mainly on that subject, it will also be no more than what we might fairly look for. Again: if the episodal vision in its character and hue partakes of the complexion of the whole series of trumpet-visions, and, as regards the church, carries a tinge of persecution, and of the still crying prayer for vengeance, not yet fully answered,—while at the same time it contains expressions and allusions which can only be explained by reference onward to the visions yet to come; this complex character is just that which would suit the point of transition at which we are now standing, when the series of visions immediately dependent on one feature in the opening of the seals is just at its end, and a new one evolving the other great subject of that general series is about to begin.

Now each one of these particulars is found as described above. For 1) the angel of ch. x. declares, with reference to the great vengeance-burden of the whole series of the trumpet-visions, respecting which the souls of the martyrs had been commanded "that they should rest yet for a time," ch. vi. 11,—that "there should be no more delay," but that in the days of the seventh angel, when he is about to blow, the whole mystery of prophecy would be fulfilled.

2) The same angel gives to the Seer the open little book, with a distinct announcement that he is to begin a new series of prophecies, and that series, by what immediately follows, ch. xi. 1 ff., evidently relating to the church of God in an especial manner.

3) The whole complexion of the episodal vision of the two witnesses, ch. xi. 3 ff., is tinged with the hue which has pervaded the series of trumpet-visions, from their source in ch. vi. 9—11, viz., that of vengeance for the sufferings of the saints: while at the same time allusions occur in it which are at present inexplicable, but will receive light hereafter, when the new series of visions is unfolded. Such are the allusions to "the wild beast which cometh up out of the abyss," ch. x. 7, and to "the great city," ib. ver. 8.

With these preliminary considerations, we may, I think, approach these episodal visions with less uncertainty.

1—11.] THE VISION OF THE LITTLE BOOK. And I saw another strong angel (another, perhaps in allusion to the many which have been mentioned: but seeing that the epithet strong occurs only in the mention of the angel who cried out in reference to the sealed book, ch. v. 2, and that the present angel's errand also regards a book, we can hardly help taking another with both substantive and adjective, and referring it to that first strong angel in ch. v. 2. And this consideration may serve to introduce the assertion, to me hardly admitting of a doubt, that this angel is not, and cannot be, our Lord Himself. Such a supposition would, it seems to me, entirely break through the consistency of apocalyptic analogy. Throughout the book, as before observed, on ch. viii. 3, angels are the ministers of the divine purposes, and the carriers out of the apocalyptic course of procedure, but are every where distinct from the divine Persons themselves. In order to this their ministry, they are invested with such symbols and such delegated attributes as besecm in each case the particular object in view: but no apparent fitness of such symbolical investiture to the divine character should induce us to break through the distinction, and introduce indistinctness and confusion into the book. When St. John means to indicate the Son of God, he indicates Him plainly: none more so: when these plain indications are absent, and I find the name angel used, I must take leave to regard the agent as distinct from Him,—however clothed, for the purposes of the particular vision, with His delegated power and attributes) descending out of heaven (the place of the Seer yet continues in heaven: see below, in ver. 1) saying, Seal up the things which the seven thunders spoke, and do not write them (compare the contrary command, ch. xxii. 10. Many speculations have been raised as to the purport of the utterances of the seven thunders, and the reason for concealing them. From the very nature of the case, these must be utterly in vain. The wisdom of Him, who signified this Revelation to His servant John, has not seen fit to reveal these things to us. But the very nature of the case also convicts some of these speculations of error. The thunders, e. g., did not speak "things exceeding human comprehension," as Ewald thinks, seeing that not only did St. John understand their utterances, but he was about to write them down for others to read, as intelligible to them also. Again, they were not any utterances of mere human device. They were spoken by command of the great angel, as ver. 3 necessarily implies: they, in common with the seals, trumpets, and vials, form part of the divinely-arranged machinery of the Apocalypse. It is matter of surprise and grief therefore, when we find historical interpreters of our day explaining them of the papal anathemas of the time of the Reformation. It seems to me that no interpretation could be more unfortunate—none more thoroughly condemnatory of the system which is compelled to have recourse to it. For, merely to insist upon one point,—if it were so, then the Apostle sealed the utterances in vain, for all know what those thunders have uttered: then the command should have run "seal the book even to the time of the end," as in Dan. xii. 4, instead of an absolute command as here. Thus much we may infer; from the very character of thunder,—that the utterances were of fearful import: from the place which they hold,—that they related to the church: from the command to conceal them,—first, encouragement, that God in His tender mercy to His own does not reveal all His terrors: secondly, godly fear, seeing that the arrows of His quiver are not exhausted, but besides things expressly foretold, there are more behind not revealed to us).

5—7.] The oath of the strong angel, that the time of fulfilment of all prophecy was close at hand. In this portion of the vision, the reminiscences of Dan. xii. 7 are very frequent:—"And I heard the man clothed in fine linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by Him that liveth for ever, that it shall be for a time, times, and a half: and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." And the angel whom I saw standing upon the sea and upon the earth, lifted his right hand (not both hands, as in Daniel above, seeing that the little book lay open on his left. On the practice of lifting the hand in swearing, compare Gen. xiv. 22 [Exod. vi. 8 and Num. xiv. 30, margin], Deut. xxxii. 40) towards heaven (as God's dwelling-place, Isa. lvii. 15), and sware by Him that liveth to the ages of the ages (compare Dan. above), who created the heaven and the things in it, and the earth and the things in it, and the sea and the things in it (this full and formal designation of God as Creator of all is given, because the subject of the angel's oath is, the mystery of God, which necessarily rests in His power alone who made all things).
We may observe, that the fact as well as the form of this oath is against the supposition, that this strong angel is the Lord Himself. Considering St. John's own declarations respecting the Son of God, it is utterly inconceivable that he should have related as spoken by Him an oath couched in these terms), that time (i. e., delay: see below) should no longer be (i. e. should no more intervene: in allusion to the answer given to the cry of the souls of the martyrs, ch. vi. 11, "And it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a time." This whole series of trumpet-judgments has been an answer to the prayers of the saints, and now the vengeance is about to receive its entire fulfilment: time shall no longer intervene: the appointed delay is at an end. That this is the meaning, is shewn by what follows. Several erroneous views have been taken of this saying: e. g., 1) that of Bede and others, that the succession of secular times should cease at the last trumpet, and apparently the A.V. ["that there should be time no longer"], —that it imports the ending of the state of time, and the beginning of eternity: 2) the chronological one of Bengel, who allots a definite length, viz. 1111½ years (?) to a time, and then interprets "there shall not elapse a time:" bringing the end, on his successive-historical system, to the year 1836; which is self-refuted: 3) the view of Vitringa and Hengstenberg, which grounds an error on the right understanding of these words themselves,—"that there should interpose no delay of time between the sound of the seventh trumpet and the fulfilment of the prophetic oracles:" for the assertion of ver. 7, which is the carrying out of this denial, expressly identifies the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he is about to sound, with the immediate fulfilment of all prophecy: but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel (i. e. the days indicated, in the fulfilment of the vision, by the sounding of the seventh angel's trumpet), when he is about to blow his trumpet (these words, when he is about, are used in their strictest propriety. For when the seventh angel does sound, the completed time of the fulfilment is simultaneous with his blowing: compare ch. xi. 18: so that it is properly said that the fulfilment comes in the days when he is about to blow. I have shewn in my Greek Test. that the version which has been suggested, "at what time soever he may have to sound," can hardly be the rendering of the words. The A.V., "when he shall begin to sound," is inadmissible), then the mystery of God (this expression will be best understood by Rom. xvi. 25, connected as it is here with the verb evangelized, or, declared the glad tidings [see below]. It is the mystery of the kingdom, as unfolded in the course of the Gospel dispensation, as is clearly shewn by the thanksgiving after the blowing of the seventh trumpet in ch. xi. 15 ff.) is fulfilled (literally, was fulfilled, —the speaker looking back, in prophetic anticipation, on the days spoken of, from a point when they should have become a thing past), as He evangelized His servants the prophets (i. e. as in our text, as He declared the glad tidings to His servants the prophets).

And he saith to me, Take and eat it up (compare Ezek. iii. 1 ff.; Jer. xv. 16; Ps. xl. 9): and it shall embitter thy belly, but in thy mouth shall be sweet as honey. And I took the book out of the hand of the angel, and ate it up: and it was in my mouth as honey; and when I had eaten it up, my belly was embittered (there is the difference between Ezekiel's roll and this, that in the prophet's case, only the sweetness in the mouth is mentioned. The Angel, dwelling most on the most important thing, the working of the contents of the book, puts the bitterness first: the Evangelist, in relating what happened, follows the order of time. The text itself will guard us against some misinterpretations of this bitterness and sweetness. It is plain that we must understand these to belong, not to differing characters of different portions of the contents of the book [as some], but to different sensations of the Evangelist in different parts of his body respecting one and the same content of the book. Nor again must we invert the order, imagining [as others] that the first bitterness leads afterwards to sweetness and joy, or [as others again] that the bitterness in the belly indicates the reception by the Evangelist, but the sweetness in the mouth, the declaration to others; proceeding on a misunderstanding of ver. 11). For further particulars, see below on ver. 11). And they say (this leaves the speakers quite indefinite; amounting in fact to no more than "it was said") to me, Thou must (i.e. it is God's will that thou shouldest: a command is laid upon thee so to do) again prophesy (as thou hast done before in writing the former part of the revelation: see in the interpretation below) concerning (not as A. V. "before:" nor can the original bear such a meaning. The substantives which follow the preposition are the objects of the prophecy) peoples and nations and languages and many kings (i.e. concerning the inhabitants of the earth, as before: compare ch. v. 9, where the Lamb's worthiness to open the former book is connected with His having redeemed some out of every tribe and language and people and nation).

I have postponed till this point the question, what we are to understand by the little book, and the Seer's concern with it. And I will at once say, before discussing the various differing interpretations, that I conceive the simple acceptance of the description and symbolism here can lead but to one conclusion: viz. that it represents the mystery of God above spoken of, the subject of the remainder of the Apocalyptic prophecies. So far, many of the principal Commentators are at one. Indeed it is difficult to conceive how any other interpretation can have been thought of, except as made necessary by some previous self-committal of the Expositor regarding the sealed book of ch. v., or by the exigencies of some historical system. But within the limits of this agreed meaning, there are many different views as to the extent of the reference of the "little book" to that which follows, and as to its relation to the seven-sealed book of ch. v. As regards these points, we may remark, 1) that the contents of the "little book" cannot well be confined to ch. xi. 1—13, or we should not have had so solemn an inauguration of it, nor so wide-reaching an announcement of the duty of the Apostle consequent on the receipt of it: 2) that the oath of the Angel must necessarily be connected with his bearing of the open book on his hand, and if so, makes it necessary to infer that the contents of the book are identical with the mystery, respecting which he swears: 3) that the episode which follows, containing the first work of the Apostle under that his new prophetic commission, inaugurates an entirely new matter—the things which befall the Church of God and the holy city, which new character of incidents continues to prevail until the very end of the book: 4) that the relation of this "little book" to the sealed book of ch. v. can hardly be doubtful to the readers of this Commentary, seeing that we have maintained that book to be the sum of the divine purposes, which is not opened at all within the limits of the apocalyptic vision, but only prepared to be opened by the removal of its seven seals. That this is not that complete record of the divine purposes, nor, technically speaking, any portion of it, must be evident to us. For it forms a small detached roll or volume, lying open on the angel's hand: it is destined for the especial individual behoof of the Seer, into whom it passes, and becomes assimilated with himself, to be given forth as he should be directed to utter it. 5) That it contained more than we possess in the remaining portion of this book, is probable. St. John doubtless knew more than he has told us. Previously to this, he knew what the seven thunders uttered: and subsequently to this, we can hardly imagine that he was ignorant of the name of the wild-beast, whose number he has given us.

It remains that we say something on the circumstances accompanying the Apostle's reception of the mysterious book. Its sweetness, when he tasted it, allusive as it is to the same circumstance in Ezekiel's eating the roll which was all lamentation, mourning, and woe, doubtless represents present satisfaction at being informed of, and admitted to know, a portion of God's holy will: of those words of which the Psalmist said, Ps. cxix. 103, "How sweet are thy words unto my taste, yea sweeter than honey unto my mouth!" But when the roll came to be not only tasted, but digested,—the nature of its contents felt within the man,—bitterness took the place of sweetness: the persecutions, the apostasies, the judgments, of the church and people of the Lord, saddened the spirit of the Seer, and dashed his joy at the first reception of the mystery of God.

CH. XI. 1—13.] The measurement of the temple of God. The two witnesses: their testimony, death, resurrection, and assumption into heaven: the earthquake, and its consequences.

This passage may well be called, even more than that previous one, ch. x. 1 ff., the crux of interpreters; as it is undoubtedly one of the most difficult in the whole Apocalypse. Referring to the histories of apocalyptic exposition for an account of the various interpretations, I will, as I have done in similar cases, endeavour to lay down a few landmarks, which may serve for guidance at least to avoid inconsistency, if we cannot do more. And I will remark, 1) that we are not bound to the hard "wooden" literal sense so insisted on in our day by some of the modern German Expositors. I would strongly recommend any one who takes that view, who will have Jerusalem mean nothing but Jerusalem, and confine the two witnesses to two persons bodily appearing there, to read through the very unsatisfactory and shuffling comment of Düsterdieck here: the result of which is, that finding, as he of course does, many discrepancies between this and our Lord's prophecy of the same destruction of Jerusalem, he is driven to the refuge that while our Lord describes matters of fact, St. John idealizes the catastrophe, setting it forth not as it really took place, but according to its inner connexion with the final accomplishment of the mystery of God, and correspondently to the hope which God's Old Testament people possessed as contrasted with the heathen power of this world, which abides in "Babylon." But really, if we have come thus far by fighting for the literal interpretation, why not a little further? Or rather why so far? If "Babylon" is the abode of the world, why not "Jerusalem" of the church? If our interpreter, maintaining the literal sense, is allowed so far to "idealize," as to exempt the temple of God itself [ver. 2] from a destruction which we know overtook it, and nine-tenths of the city [ver. 13] from an overthrow which destroyed it all, surely there is an end to the meaning of words. If Jerusalem here is simply Jerusalem, and the prophecy regards her overthrow by the Romans, and especially if this passage is to be made such use of as to set aside the testimony of Irenæus as to the date of the Apocalypse by the stronger testimony of the Apocalypse itself [so Düsterdieck from Lücke], then must every particular be shewn to tally with known history; or if this cannot be done, at least it must be shewn that none contradicts it. If this cannot be done, then we may fairly infer that the prophecy has no such reference, or only remotely, here and there, and not as its principal subject. 2) Into whatever difficulty we may be led by the remark, it is no less true, that the "holy city" of ver. 2 cannot be the same as the "great city" of ver. 8. This has been felt by the literal interpreters, and they have devised ingenious reasons why the holy city should afterwards be called the great city: so De Wette, "he named Jerusalem the great city, because he can no more call her holy after her desecration" [but he need not therefore call her great, by which epithet she is never called].—Düsterdieck, "because it is impossible in one breath to call a city 'holy,' and 'Solom and Egypt'" [most true: then must we not look for some other city than one which this very prophecy has called holy?]. So far Joachim says well, "But his saying, 'in the streets of the great city,' does not seem to favour the literal sense. For it [Jerusalem] is never called the great city, but rather Nineveh and Babylon are thus called: because many are called and but few chosen." His other reason see in the interpretation below. 3) We are compelled, if I am not mistaken, to carry the above considerations somewhat further, by the very conditions of the prophecy itself. For it is manifestly and undeniably of an anticipatory character. It is not, and cannot be, complete in itself. The words of ver. 7, "the wild-beast which cometh up out of the abyss," bear no meaning where they stand, but require, in order to be understood at all, to be carried on into the succeeding visions of ch. xiii. ff. And if into those visions, then into a period when this wild-beast has received power from the dragon,—when, as in ch. xiii. 7, he makes war with the saints and conquers them, and all on earth except the elect are worshipping him. 4) Let us observe the result as affecting our interpretation. We are necessarily carried on by the very terms of our present compendious prophecy, into the midst of another prophecy, far more detailed and full of persons and incidents: of one which has its great city, its temple of God, its worshippers in it, its witness of Jesus, and other coincident particulars. What inference does a sound principle of interpretation force upon us? What, if not this—that our present compendious prophecy, as in the particular of the beast that comes out of the abyss, so in its other features, must be understood as giving in summary, and introducing, that larger one? and consequently, that its terms are to be understood by those of that larger one, not servilely and literally where they stand? And observe, this is deduced from the very necessity of the case itself, as shewn in ver. 7, not from any system throwing its attraction forward and biasing our views. We cannot understand this prophecy at all, except in the light of those that follow: for it introduces by anticipation their dramatis personæ. 5) If I mistake not, we thus gain much light on the difficulties of this prophecy. If it is a compendium of the more detailed prophecies which follow, opening the great series regarding God's church, and reaching forward to the time of the seventh trumpet, then its separate parts, so hard to assign on any other view, at once fall into their places. Then, e.g. we at once know what is meant by the temple and its worshippers, viz., that these expressions are identical in reference with those others in the subsequent prophecy which point out an elect remnant, a Goshen in Egypt, a Zoar from Sodom, a number who do not worship the wild-beast and his image, who are not defiled with women, &c. And so of the rest.—6) It will then be on this principle that I shall attempt the exposition of this difficult prophecy. Regarding it as a summary of the more detailed one which follows, I shall endeavour to make the two cast light on one another: searching for the meaning of the symbols here used in their fuller explanation there, and gaining perhaps some further insight into meanings there from expressions occurring here.

1, 2.] Command to measure the temple, but not the outer court, which is given to the Gentiles. And there was given to me (by whom, is not said, but it is left indefinite, as at ch. vi. 11, viii. 2) a reed like to a staff (see refl.), saying, (this word, saying, is out of the construction, and indefinite: as in ch. iv. 1), Arise (this word does not necessarily imply that the Apostle was kneeling before) and measure the temple of God and the altar (apparently, the altar of incense: as that alone stood in the temple, properly so called. But perhaps we must not be too minute in particularizing), and them that worship in it (see the previous remarks on this prophecy. The measuring here is evidently for the purpose of taking account of, understanding the bearing and dimensions of, that which is to be measured: see ch. xxi. 15, where the heavenly Jerusalem is measured by the angel. But here two questions arise: 1) What is that which is measured? and 2) when does the measuring take place? 1) I have no doubt that, as above hinted, the temple of God and its altar are to be here taken symbolically, as the other principal features of the prophecy: and to one believing this, there can be but little further doubt as to what meaning he shall assign to the terms. Thus understood, they can only bear one meaning: viz., that of the Church of the elect servants of God, every where in this book symbolized by Jews in deed and truth. The society of these, as a whole, is the temple, agreeably to Scripture symbolism elsewhere, e. g. 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17, and is symbolized by the inner or holy place of the Jerusalem temple, in and among which they as true Israelites and priests unto God, have a right to worship and minister. These are they who, properly speaking, alone are measured: estimated again and again in this book by tale and number—partakers in the first resurrection,—the Church of the first-born. Then as to our question 2), it is one which, so far as I know, has not engaged the attention of expositors. When a command is elsewhere in this book given to the Seer, we may observe that his fulfilment of it is commonly indicated. He is commanded to write, and the writing before us proves his obedience. He is ordered to take the little book, and he goes and takes it. But of the fulfilment by him of this command, Arise and measure, no hint appears to be given. The voice goes on continuously, until it melts imperceptibly into the narrative of the vision, and we are startled by "and I heard a loud voice," in ver. 12, when we had thought it to be still speaking. After that, we hear no more of the measuring, till another and more glorious building is measured in ch. xxi. This being so, either 1) which is inconceivable, the measurement does not take place at all, or, 2) which is hardly probable, it takes place and no result is communicated to us, or 3) the result of it is found in the subsequent prophecies: in the minute and careful distinctions between the servants of God and those who receive the mark of the wild-beast—in all those indications which point out to us the length and breadth and depth and height, both of faith, and of unfaithfulness). And the court which is outside the temple (i. e. apparently, every thing except the temple itself: not merely the outer court or court of the Gentiles. That only the temple itself, in the strictest sense, is to be measured, is significant for the meaning above maintained) cast out (of thy measurement. But these strong words, conveying so slight a meaning, doubtless bear in them a tinge also of the stronger meaning, "reckon as profane," "account not as included in the sacred precinct"), and measure not it (it has a slight emphasis: otherwise, it need not have been expressed in the original), because it was given (viz. at the time when the state of things subsisting in the vision came in: or, in God's apportionment) to the Gentiles

(if the temple and the worshippers represent the elect church of the first-born, the nations will correspond to those who are outside this sacred enclosure: those over whom eventually the millennial reign of ch. xx. shall be exercised: those from among whom shall spring the enmity against God's church, but among whom also shall be many who shall fear, and give God glory, compare ver. 13. Of these is formed the outward seeming church, mixed up with the world; in them, though not in each case commensurate with them, is Babylon, is the reign of the wild-beast, the agency of the false prophet: they are the dwellers on the earth, the material on which judgment and mercy are severally exercised in the rest of this book [see especially ver. 18], as contrasted with God's own people, gathered and to be gathered out from among them), and they shall tread down (i.e. trample as conquerors, the outer church being in subjection to them: see Luke xxi. 24, Dan. viii. 13. The other meaning, shall tread, merely, is of course included; but must not be made the prevalent one. The period named shall be one during which "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and violent men take it by force," Matt. xi. 12) the holy city (Jerusalem, in the literal sense of the prophecy: the whole temple except the temple proper, or sanctuary itself, being counted with the city outside) forty and two months (this period occurs in three forms in this book: 1) as forty-two months; see ch. xiii. 5: 2) as 1260 days = 42 months  $\times$  30, see ver. 3, ch. xii. 6: 3) as time, times, and half a time =  $3\frac{1}{2}$  years =  $3 \times 360 + 180$  = 1260 days, see ch. xii. 14. This latter designation is also found in Dan. vii. 25, xii. 7. With respect to these periods, I may say that, equal as they certainly seem to be, we have no right to suppose them, in any two given cases, to be identical, unless the context requires such a supposition. For instance, in these two verses, 2 and 3, there is strong temptation to regard the two equal periods as coincident and identical: but it is plain that such a view is not required by the context; the prophecy contains no note of such coincidence, but may be very simply read without it, on the view that the two periods are equal in duration, but independent of one another: and the rather, that this prophecy, as has been already shewn, is of a compendious character, hereafter to be stated at large. I will further remark, and the reader will find this abundantly borne out by research into histories of apocalyptic exegesis, that no solution at all approaching to a satisfactory one has ever yet been given of any one of these periods. This being so, my principle is to regard them as being still among the things unknown to the Church, and awaiting their elucidation by the event. It is our duty to feel our way by all the indications which Scripture furnishes, and by the light which history, in its main and obvious salient events, has thrown on Scripture: and, when those fail us, to be content to confess our ignorance. An apocalyptic commentary which explains every thing, is self-convicted of error).

3—13.] THE TWO WITNESSES: their testimony, death, resurrection, ascension: consequences on the beholders. The remarks just made are here especially applicable. No solution has ever been given of this portion of the prophecy. Either the two witnesses are literal,—two individual men,—or they are symbolical,—two individuals taken as the concentration of principles and characteristics, and this either in themselves, or as representing men who embodied those principles and characteristics. In the following notes I shall point out how far one, how far another of these views, is favoured by the text, and leave the reader to judge. And I will give to my two witnesses (the heavenly voice is still speaking in the name of Christ. That we must not press the my to the inference that Christ himself speaks, is plain by the words, where also their Lord was crucified, below. The definite article the [in the original, it is, to the two witnesses of me] seems as if the two witnesses were well known, and distinct in their individuality. The two is essential to the prophecy, and is not to be explained away. No interpretation can be right which does not, either in individuals, or in characteristic lines of testimony, retain and bring out this dualism. See further below), and they shall prophesy

(this has generally been taken to mean, shall preach repentance. It may be so: but in ch. x. 11, the verb is used in its later and stricter sense of foretelling events, as in 1 Pet. i. 19; Jude 14. If their testimony consisted in denouncing judgment, the other would necessarily be combined with it) a thousand two hundred and sixty days (Düsterdieck remarks that the fact of a period of the same length as the forty-two months being now expressed in days, implies that they will prophesy day by day throughout it. The reader will of course see, that the two questions, of these days being days or years, and of the individuality or the symbolical character of the witnesses, are mutually connected together. He will also bear in mind that it is a pure assumption that the two periods, the forty-two months and the 1260 days, coincide over the same space of time. The duration of time is that during which the power of Elijah's prophecy shut up the heaven: viz. three years and six months: see Luke iv. 25, and more on ver. 6 below), clothed in sackcloth (in token of need of repentance and of approaching judgment: see Isa. xxii. 12; Jer. iv. 8, vi. 26; Jonah iii. 5. Certainly this portion of the prophetic description strongly favours the individual interpretation. For first, it is hard to conceive how whole bodies of men and churches could be thus described: and secondly, the principal symbolical interpreters have left out, or passed very slightly, this important particular. One does not see how bodies of men who lived like other men [their being the victims of persecution is another matter], can be said to have prophesied clothed in sackcloth. It is to be observed that such was the garment of Elijah; see 2 Kings i. 8, and compare Matt. iii. 4). These are the two olive trees and the two candlesticks which stand before the Lord of the earth (the whole from ref. Zech., to which the article the refers. But it is to be observed that while in Zech. we have the two olive trees, and spoken of in the same terms as here, there is but one candlestick, with its seven lights, which very seven lights, as there interpreted in ver. 10, are referred to in our ch. iv. 5, v. 6. So that it is somewhat difficult to say, whence the two candlesticks have come. The most probable view is that St. John has taken up and amplified the prophetic symbolism of Zechariah, carrying it on by the well-known figure of lights, as representing God's testifying servants. Who the two "sons of oil" in the prophet were, whether Zerubbabel and Joshua, or the prophets Zechariah and Haggai, is of no import to our text here); and if any one be minded to harm them, fire goeth forth (the present tense, used of that which is habitual and settled, though yet future: see also on ver. 7 below) out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies (so Elijah, 2 Kings i. 10 ff.: and so ran the word of promise to Jeremiah, Jer. v. 14, "I will make my words in thy mouth fire, and this people wood, and it shall devour them:" the two being here combined together. Compare also Eccles. xlviii. 1, "Then stood up Elias the prophet as fire, and his word burned like a lamp"; and if any one be minded to harm them, after this manner (see Eccles. xlviii. 3, "He three times brought down fire") he must be killed (this whole description is most difficult to apply, on the allegorical interpretation; as is that which follows. And as might have been expected, the allegorists halt and are perplexed exceedingly. The double announcement here seems to stamp the literal sense, and the words, if any one, and, he must be killed, are decisive against any mere national application of the words. Individuality could not be more strongly indicated. These have (see on the present tense above) [the] power to shut the heaven, that the rain may not rain during the days of their prophecy (as did Elijah: the duration of the time also corresponding: see ref.): and they have power over the waters to turn them into blood (as had Moses, ref.), and to smite the earth with (see 1 Sam. iv. 8, from which, applying to the plagues in Egypt, the expression is taken) every plague as often as they shall be minded (all this points out the spirit and power of Moses, combined with that of Elias. And undoubtedly, it is in these two directions that we must look for the two witnesses, or lines of witnesses. The one impersonates the law, the other the prophets. The one reminds us of the prophet whom God should raise up like unto Moses; the other of Elias the prophet, who should come before the great and terrible day of the Lord; "Who wast ordained for reproof in their times, to pacify the wrath of the Lord's judgment, before it brake forth into fury," Ecclus. xlviii. 10. But whether we are to regard these prophecies as to be fulfilled by individuals, or by lines of testimony, must depend entirely on the indications here given). And when they have finished (the tense used in the original implies, as plainly as words can imply it, that the whole period of their testimony will be at an end when that which is next said shall happen. All attempts of the allegorical expositors to escape this plain meaning of the words are in vain. Such is, "when they shall be about finishing;" "whilst they shall perform;" "when they shall have completed their testimony," meaning thereby not the whole course of it, but any one complete delivery of it, which others might have followed) their testimony, the wild-beast that cometh up out of the abyss (this is the first mention of the wild-beast; and the whole description, as remarked above, is anticipatory. The present tense gives simply designation, as so often: and is not to be interpreted future, "that is to come up." The character of the beast is that he cometh up out of the abyss.

This wild-beast is evidently identical with that mentioned in ch. xvii. 8, of which the same term is used, "which is about to come up out of the abyss:" and if so, with that also which is introduced ch. xiii. 1 ff., as "a wild-beast coming up out of the sea," seeing that the same details, of the seven heads and ten horns, are ascribed to the two. But, though the appellation is anticipatory as far as this book is concerned, the beast spoken of was already familiar to its readers from Dan. vii.: see below) shall make war with them (the very expression is from Dan. vii. 21), and shall conquer them and shall kill them. And their corpse ("their wreck." The singular is used, not for any mystical reason, but simply because the word in the original does not properly signify a dead body, but that which has fallen, be it of one, or of many. Below, where the context requires the separate corpses to be specified, we have the

and obvious one. The only other place in which we find this usage of the word is in 1 Cor. ii. 14, which see, and notes
there) Sodom and Egypt (those Commentators who maintain that the literal
Jerusalem is here meant, allege Isa. i.
9 ff., and Ezek. xvi. 48, as places where she is called Sodom. But the latter place is no example: for there Jerusalem is compared, in point of sinfulness, with her sisters, Samaria and Sodom, and is not called Sodom at all. And in Isaiah i.
9 ff., 1) it is not Jerusalem, but the Jewish people in general [see also Isa.
iii. 9] that are called by this name: and that 2) not so much in respect of depravity, as of the desolation of Judæa, which [vv. 7—9] almost equalled that of the devoted cities. And even supposing this to be a ease in point, no instance can be alleged of Jerusalem being called Egypt, or any thing bearing such an interpretation.
Whereas in the subsequent prophecy both these comparisons are naturally suggested with regard to the great city there mentioned: viz that of Sodom by ch. xix. 3, compared with Gen. xix. 28, and that of Egypt, and indeed Sodom also, by ch. xviii.
4 ff.), where their Lord also (as well as they: not the specific term crucifixion, but the general fact of death by persecution, underlying it, being in the Writer's mind) was crucified (these words have principally led those who hold the literal Jerusalem to be meant. But if, as I believe I have shewn, such an interpretation is forbidden by the previous words, then we must not fall back on an erroneous view on account of the apparent requirements of these words, but enquire whether by the light of the subsequent prophecy, which is an expansion of this, we may find some meaning for them in accordance with the preceding conditions. And this is surely not difficult to discover. If we compare ch. xviii.

24 with Matt. xxiii. 35, we shall find a wider ground than the mere literal Jerusalem on which to place the Lord's own martyrdom and that of His saints. It is true, He was crucified at Jerusalem: but it is also true that He was crucified not in, but outside the city, and by the hands, not of Jews, but of Romans. The fact is, that the literal Jerusalem, in whom was found the blood of all the saints who had been slain on earth, has been superseded by that wider and greater city, of which this prophesy speaks: and as the temple, in prophetic language, has become the church of God, so the outer city, in the same language, has become the great city which will be the subject of God's final judgments. For those who consider this, there can be no hesitation in interpreting even this local designation also of this great city). And some from among the peoples and tribes and languages and nations look upon (the prophetic history is carried on in the present, as in ch. xviii.
11 compared with ver. 9, and elsewhere) their corpse (see above) three days and a half (on this period we may remark, that these 3½ days are connected by analogy with the periods previously mentioned: with the 1260 days and 42 months = 3½ years: and that in each case the half of the mystic number 7

O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and of the foreknowledge of God!"—labours under this fatal defect;—that whereas his 3 years, from May 5, 1514, to May 5, 1517, are years of 365 days, his half-year, from May 5, 1517, to Oct. 31, of the same year, is "180, or half 360 days;" i. e. wanting  $2\frac{1}{2}$  days of the time required according to that reckoning. I may observe, that in his Apocalypsis Alfordiana, p. 128, he has repeated this inconsistency, and do not permit their corpses to be put into a tomb (the word in the original means not a grave, but a monument, or a tomb). And they that dwell upon the earth (i. e., the godless world) rejoice over them (at their fall) and are glad, and shall send gifts to one another (as on a day of festival, see Neh. viii. 10, 12; Esth. ix. 19, 22), because these two prophets tormented them that dwelt upon the earth (viz. by the plagues above mentioned, vv. 5, 6). And after the three days and an half, the Spirit of life (not, a spirit: the whole diction is closely imitated from that used of the dry bones in Ezek. xxxvii.) from God (these words, from God, belong not only to life, but to the Spirit of life) entered in them, and they stood upon their feet (the very words of Ezek. xxxvii. 10), and great fear fell upon those who beheld them. And they heard a great voice from heaven saying to them, Come up hither. And they went up to heaven in the cloud (or, as we more commonly say in English, the clouds: viz. the cloud which ordinarily floats in the air; the mist: not, "the cloud of Christ's glory:" nor needing identification with any cloud previously mentioned in this book. But the ascension of the witnesses partakes of the character of His ascension. No attempt has been made to explain this ascension by those who interpret the witnesses figuratively of the Old and New Testament, or the like. The modern historical system, which can interpret such a Scripture phrase of "calling up to political ascendancy and power," surely needs no refutation from me), and their enemies beheld them. there were slain in the earthquake names of men (i. e. men themselves, the expression shewing that the number is carefully and precisely stated, as if the name of each were recounted: see below) seven thousands (i. e. the number 7000. In every place of the 23 where the word "chilias" occurs in the New Test., it signifies simply the numeral 1000, and never a chiliad, or a province, as the historical interpretation, forcing the expression to mean the seven Dutch united provinces, which were lost to the Papacy at the Reformation. It also forces the expression names of men out of its idiomatic sense to import "titles of dignity and command," Duchies, Marquisates, Lordships), and the rest (of the inhabitants of the city) became terrified, and gave glory (it would be entirely needless to contend that gave belongs to the same subject as became terrified, viz. the rest, had not an attempt been made to supply "the ascended witnesses" as a new subject. To say nothing of the inapplicability of the instances cited to justify such a view, our ch. xiv. 7 is decisive against it, where men are exhorted to "fear God, and give Him glory:" as also ch. xvi. 9, where the men tormented "did not repent, to give Him glory." In fact, the giving glory to God is not equivalent in the Scriptures to thanking God, but is, as Bengel notices, "a mark of conversion," or at all events, of the recognition of God. The exceptions to this are more apparent than real, e. g. Luke xvii. 18, where recognition is the main feature: Rev. iv. 9, where glory does not stand alone. See also 1 Sam. vi. 5. Josh. vii. 19 is a remarkable example of the ordinary meaning of the phrase) to the God of heaven (an expression otherwise confined to the later books of the Old Test.). The second woe is past (see on ch. ix. 12): behold, the third woe cometh quickly (the episodical visions of ch. x. 1—11, xi. 1—13, are finished; and the prophecy recurs to the plagues of the sixth trumpet, ch. ix. 13—21. These formed the second woe: and upon these the third is to follow. But in actual relation, and in detail, it does not immediately follow. Instead of it, we have voices of thanksgiving in heaven, for that the hour of God's kingdom and vengeance is come. The Seer is not yet prepared to set forth the nature of this taking of the kingdom; this remand to God's servants, this destruction of the destroyers of the earth. Before he does so, another series of prophetic visions must be given, regarding not merely the dwellers on the earth, but the Church herself, her glory and her shame, her faithfulness and her apostasy. When this series has been given, then shall be declared in its fulness the manner and the process of the time of the end. And consequently as at the end of the vision of the seals, so here also. The sixth seal gave the immediately preceding signs of the great day—we were shewn in anticipatory episodes, the gathering of the elect and the multitude before the throne, and then the veil was dropt upon that series of visions and another began. And now, God's avenging judgments on the earth, in answer to the prayers of His saints, having reached their final point of accomplishment, and the armies of heaven having given solemn thanks for the hour being come, again the veil is dropt, and again a new procession of visions begins from the beginning. The third woe, so soon to come, is in narration deferred until all the various underplots, so to speak, of God's Providence have been brought onward to a point ready for the great and final dénouement).

trumpet, and the seventh vial, are all differently accompanied from any of the preceding series in each case. b) At each seventh member of the series we hear what is done, not on earth, but in heaven,—the half-hour's silence, the song of thanksgiving, the voice from the temple and the throne, saying, "It is done." c) At each seventh member likewise we have it related in the form of a solemn conclusion, that thunders, and lightnings, and voices (and an earthquake, and a great hail) occurred: see ch. xvi. 18 ff. d) At each seventh member we have plain indication in the imagery or by direct expression, that the end is come, or close at hand: 1) by the imagery of the sixth seal, and the two episodes, preceding the seventh seal: 2) by the declaration here, "the time of the dead is come to be judged:" 3) by "It is done," sounding from the temple and the throne on the pouring out of the seventh vial. e) All this forms strong ground for inference, that the three series of visions are not continuous, but resumptive: not indeed going over the same ground with one another, either of time or of occurrence, but each evolving something which was not in the former, and putting the course of God's Providence in a different light. It is true, that the seals involve the trumpets, the trumpets the vials: but it is not in mere temporal succession: the involution and inclusion are far deeper: the world-wide vision of the seals containing the cry for vengeance, out of which is evolved the series of the trumpets: and this again containing the episodic visions of the little book and the witnesses, out of which are evolved the visions of ecclesiastical faithfulness and apostasy which follow) saying (whose these voices were, is not specified: but we may fairly assume them to have been those of the armies of heaven and the four living-beings, as distinguished from the twenty-four elders which follow), The Kingdom over the world is become our Lord's and of his Christ (no supply, such as "the Kingdom," is required. The genitive in both cases is one merely of possession), and He (no emphasis on He, as we are almost sure to lay on it, perhaps from the accent unavoidable in the Hallelujah Chorus of Handel) shall reign to the ages of the ages (this announcement necessarily belongs to the time close on the millennial reign: and this is no more than we might expect from the declaration of the strong angel in ch. x. 7). And the twenty-four elders (representing the church in glory) which before God sat upon their thrones, fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, saying, We give thanks to Thee, O Lord God the Almighty (this ascription of thanks is the return for the answer to the prayers of the saints furnished by the judgments of the trumpets), who art and wast, because Thou hast taken Thy great might and hast reigned. And the nations were angry (the Septuagint translators begin Ps. xcvi. [our 99th] with these words: "The Lord reigned, let the people be angry"), and Thine anger came, and the time of the dead, to be judged (another indication that the end is at hand when these words are

The thanksgiving is not that God hath done all this, but that the hour is come for it all to take place. Before it does, another important series of visions has to be unfolded).

19.] Concluding, and transitional. And the temple of God was opened in the heaven, and the ark of His covenant was seen in His temple (the episode of ch. xi. 1 ff. began with measuring the temple of God, the shadow of things in the heavens: and now, when the time is come for the judgments there indicated to be fulfilled, that temple itself in the heavens is laid open. The ark of the Covenant is seen, the symbol of God's faithfulness in bestowing grace on His people, and inflicting vengeance on His people's enemies. This is evidently a solemn and befitting inauguration of God's final judgments, as it is a conclusion of the series pointed out by the trumpets, which have been inflicted in answer to the prayers of His saints. It is from this temple that the judgments proceed forth [compare ch. xiv. 15, 17, xv. 5 ff., xvi. 17]; from His inmost and holiest place that those acts of vengeance are wrought which the great multitude in heaven recognize as faithful and true, ch. xix. 2. The symbolism of this verse, the opening for the first time of the heavenly temple, also indicates of what nature the succeeding visions are to be: that they will relate to God's covenant people and His dealings with them): and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and a great hail (the solemn salvos, so to speak, of the artillery of heaven, with which each series of visions is concluded: see this commented on above, at the beginning of this section).

CHAP. XII.] THE VISION OF THE WOMAN AND THE GREAT RED DRAGON. On the nature of this vision, as introductory of the whole imagery of the latter part of the Apocalypse, I have already remarked at ch. xi. It is only needful now to add, that the principal details of the present section are rather descriptive than strictly prophetic: relating, just as in the prophets the descriptions of Israel and Judah, to things passed and passing, and serving for the purpose of full identification and of giving completeness to the whole vision. And a great (important in its meaning, as well as vast in its appearance) sign (one of those appearances by which God signified to John the revelations of this book, ch. i. 1) was seen in heaven (heaven here is manifestly not only the show-place of the visions as seen by the Seer, but has a substantial place in the vision: for below, ver. 7 ff., we have the heaven contrasted with the earth, and the dragon cast out of heaven into the earth.

See more there), a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon beneath her feet (see Cant. vi. 10, which seems to be borne in mind), and on her head a crown of twelve stars (the whole symbolism points to the Church, the bride of God: and of course, from the circumstances afterwards related, the Old Test. church, at least at this beginning of the vision. That the blessed Virgin cannot be intended, is plain from the subsequent details, and was recognized by the early expositors. The crown of twelve stars represents the Patriarchs. Victorinus interprets the woman as the ancient church, and the twelve stars as above), and [she is] (or, being) with child [and] crieth out in pangs and tormented to bring forth. And another sign was seen in heaven: and behold, a great red dragon (interpreted below, ver. 9, to be the devil, the ancient serpent: see also vv. 13, 15. He is red perhaps for the combined reasons, of the wasting properties of fire, and the redness of blood: see John viii. 44), having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his head seven diadems (the Dragon being the devil, these symbolic features must be interpreted of the assuming by him of some of those details in the form of the beast in ch. xiii. 1 ff., to whom afterwards he gives his power and his throne: in other words, as indicating that he lays wait for the woman's offspring in the form of that antichristian power which is afterwards represented by the beast. At the same time, the seven crowned heads may possess an appropriateness of their own, belonging as they do to the dragon alone [the beast has the crowns on his horns, ch. xiii. 1]. They may represent, as he is Prince of this world, universality of earthly dominion. The ten horns belong to the fourth beast of Daniel, vii. 7, 20). And his tail draggeth down the third part of the stars of the heaven, and cast them to the earth (so the little horn in Dan. viii. 10, "cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them." The allusion here may be to the devil having persuaded and drawn down to perdition the rebel angels. The magnitude and fury of the dragon are graphically given by the fact of its tail, in its lashing backwards and forwards in fury, sweeping down the stars of heaven). And the dragon standeth (not "stood." Pliny describes the dragon as not prone and gliding like a serpent, but walking lofty and erect) before the woman which is about to bear, that when she hath borne he may devour her child (this was what the devil instigated Herod the Great to do, who was the dependant of the Roman Empire. humiliation: see below). And she bore a male son, who shall rule (literally, shepherd, i. e. order and guide) all the nations with a rod of iron (these words, cited verbatim from the Septuagint version of the Messianic Psalm ii., leave no possibility of doubt, who is here intended. The man child is the Lord Jesus Christ, and none other. And this result is a most important one for the fixity of reference of the whole prophecy. It forms one of those landmarks by which the legitimacy of various interpretations may be tested; and of which we may say, notwithstanding the contradiction sure to be given to the saying, that every interpretation which oversteps their measure is thereby convicted of error. Again, the exigencies of this passage require that the birth should be understood literally and historically, of that Birth of which all Christians know. And be it observed, that this rule of interpretation is no confident assertion of mine, as has been represented, but a result from the identifying use of words of the prophetic Scripture, spoken of Him who will not suffer His honour to be given to another): and her child was caught up to God and to his throne (i. e. after a conflict with the Prince of this world, who came and tried Him but found nothing in Him, the Son of the woman was taken up to heaven and sat on the right hand of God. Words can hardly be plainer than these. It surely is but needful to set against them, thus understood, the interpretation which would regard them as fulfilled by the "mighty issue of the consummated birth of a son of the church, a baptized emperor, to political supremacy in the Roman empire," "united with the solemn public profession of the divinity of the Son of man"). And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath there (so literally) a place prepared from (so literally: the source of the preparation being His command) God, that they

(the subject to the verb is left indefinite. In ver. 14 below, it is simply passive, where she is nourished) may nourish her there for a thousand two hundred and sixty days (the whole of this verse is anticipatory: the same incident being repeated with its details and in its own place in the order of the narrative below, vv. 13 ff. See there the comment and interpretation. The fact of its being here inserted by anticipation is very instructive as to that which now next follows, as not being consecutive in time after the flight of the woman, but occurring before it, and in fact referred to now in the prophecy as leading to that pursuit of the woman by the dragon, which led to it). 7 ff.] And there was war in heaven (we now enter upon a mysterious series of events in the world of spirits, with regard to which merely fragmentary hints are given us in the Scriptures. In the Old Test. we find the adversary Satan in heaven. In Job i., ii., he appears before God as the Tempter of His saints: in Zech. iii. we have him accusing Joshua the high priest in God's presence. Again our Lord in Luke x. 18 exclaims, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven," where see note. Compare also John xii. 31. So that this casting down of Satan from the office of accuser in heaven was evidently connected with the great justifying work of redemption. His voice is heard before God no more: the day of acceptance in Christ Jesus has dawned. And his angels, those rebel spirits whom he led away, are cast down with him, into the earth, where now the conflict is waging during the short time which shall elapse between the Ascension and the second Advent, when he shall be bound. All this harmonizes together: and though we know no more of the matter, we have at least this sign that our knowledge, as far as it goes, is sound,—that the few hints given us do not, when thus interpreted, contradict one another, but agree as portions of one whole. The war here spoken of appears in some of its features in the book of Daniel, ch. x. 13, 21, xii. 1. In Jude 9 also, we find Michael the adversary of the devil in the matter of the saints of God: Michael ("one of the chief princes," Dan. x. 13: "your prince," i. e. of the Jewish nation, ib. ver. 21: "the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people," ib. xii. 1: "the archangel," Jude 9: not to be identified with Christ, any more than any other of the great angels in this book. Such identification here would confuse hopelessly the actors in this heavenly scene. Satan's being cast out of heaven to the earth is the result, not of his contest with the Lord Himself, of which it is only an incident leading to a new phase, but of the appointed conflict with his faithful fellow-angels led on by the archangel Michael. The expression, his angels, in both cases requires a nearer correspondence in the two chiefs than is found between Satan and the Son of God) and his angels to war with the dragon, and the dragon warred and his angels, and [they] (or, he: the reading is doubtful) prevailed not, nor was even (this brings in a climax) their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast down, the ancient serpent (in allusion to the history in Gen. iii. Remember also that St. John had related the saying of our Lord, that the devil was "a murderer from the beginning," the cognate term in the original to ancient here), he who is called the devil and Satan, he who deceiveth the whole [inhabited] world, was cast to the earth, and his angels were cast with him (I would appeal, in passing, to the solemnity of the terms here used, and the particularity of the designation, and ask whether it is possible to understand this of the mere casting down of paganism from the throne of the Roman empire? whether the words themselves do not vindicate their plain literal sense, as further illustrated by the song of rejoicing which follows?). quered him on account of the blood of the Lamb (i. e. by virtue of that blood having been shed: not as in A. V., "by the blood," which is an ungrammatical rendering. The meaning is far more significant; their victory over Satan was grounded in, was a consequence of, His having shed his precious blood: without that, the adversary's charges against them would have been unanswerable. It is remarkable, that the rabbinical books give a tradition that Satan accuses men all the days of the year, except on the Day of Atonement) and on account of the word of their testimony (the strict sense of the preposition must again be kept. It is because they have given a faithful testimony, even unto death, that they are victorious: this is their part, their appropriation of and standing in the virtue of that blood of the Lamb. Without both these, victory would not have been theirs: both together form its ground); and they loved not their life unto death (i. e. they carried their not-love of their life even unto death). For this cause (viz., because the dragon is cast down: as is shewn by the contrast below) rejoice, ye heavens and they that dwell in them. Woe to the earth and the sea, because the devil is come down to you (the earth and sea) having great wrath (the enmity, which was manifested as his natural state towards Christ, ver. 4, being now kindled into wrath), because he knoweth that he hath but a short season (i. e. because the Lord cometh quickly, and then the period of his active hostility against the church and the race whom Christ has redeemed will be at an end: he will be bound and cast into the pit. Until then, he is carrying it on, in ways which the prophecy goes on to detail). And when the dragon saw that he was cast down to the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the male child (the narrative at ver. 6 is again taken up and given more in detail. There, the reason of the woman's flight is matter of inference: here, it is plainly expressed, and the manner of the flight also is related). And there were given (in the usual apocalyptic sense, i. e. granted by God for His purposes) to the woman [the] two wings of the great eagle (the figure is taken from Old Test. expressions used by God in reference to the flight of Israel from Egypt. The most remarkable of these is in Exod. xix. 4, "I have you on eagle's wings, and brought you unto myself." So also Deuteronomy in the ref. But the articles are not to be taken as identifying the eagle with the figure used in those places, which would be most unnatural: much less must they be supposed to identify this eagle with that in ch. viii. 13, with which it has no connexion. The articles are simply generic. With these Old Test. references before us, we can hardly be justified in pressing the figure of the eagle's wings to an interpretation in the fulfilment of the prophecy, or in making it mean that the flight took place under the protection of the Roman eagles, as some have done), that she might fly into the wilderness (the flight of Israel out of Egypt is still borne in mind) to her place (prepared of God, ver. 6: so also in Exod. xxiii. 20), where she is nourished (as God nourished Israel with manna in the wilderness, see Deut. viii. 3, 16) a time and times and half a time (i. e. 3½ years; 42 months, ch. xi. 2; 1260 days, ver. 6 and ch. xi. 3) from (importing "safe from," "far from," "hidden from") the face of the dragon. And the serpent cast out of his mouth after the woman water as a river, that he might make her to be borne away by the river. And the earth helped the woman, and the earth opened her mouth and swallowed down the river which the dragon cast out of his mouth (in passing to the interpretation, we cannot help being struck with the continued analogy between this prophecy and the history of the Exodus. There we have the flight into the wilderness, there the feeding in the wilderness, as already remarked: there again the forty-two stations, corresponding to the forty-two months of the three years and half of this prophecy: there too the miraculous passage of the Red Sea, not indeed in strict correspondence with this last feature, but at least suggestive of it. These analogies themselves suggest caution in the application of the words of the prophecy; and in this direction. The church in the wilderness of old was not, as some expositors would represent this woman, the pure church of God: His veritable servants were hidden in the midst of that church, as much as that church itself was withdrawn from the enmity of Pharaoh. And, it is to be noted, it was that very church herself which afterwards, when seated at Jerusalem, forsook her Lord and Husband, and committed adultery with the kings of the earth, and became drunk with the blood of the saints. It would seem then that we must not understand the woman of the invisible spiritual church of Christ, nor her flight into the wilderness of the withdrawal of God's true servants from the eyes of the world. They indeed have been just as much withdrawn from the eyes of the world at all times, and will continue so till the great manifestation of the sons of God. I own that, considering the analogies and the language used, I am much more disposed to interpret the persecution of the woman by the dragon of the various persecutions by Jews which followed the Ascension, and her flight into the wilderness of the gradual withdrawal of the church and her agency from Jerusalem and Judæa, finally consummated by the flight to the mountains on the approaching siege, commanded by our Lord Himself. And then the river which the dragon sent out of his mouth after the woman might be variously understood,—of the Roman armies which threatened to sweep away Christianity in the wreck of the Jewish nation,—or of the persecutions which followed the church into her retreats, but eventually became absorbed by the civil power turning Christian,—or of the Jewish nation itself, banded together against Christianity wherever it appeared, but eventually itself becoming powerless against it by its dispersion and ruin,—or again, of the influx of heretical opinions from the Pagan philosophies which tended to swamp the true faith. I confess that not one of these seems to me satisfactorily to answer the conditions: nor do we gain any thing by their combination. But any thing within reasonable regard for the analogies and symbolism of the text seems better than the now too commonly received historical interpretation, with its wild fancies and arbitrary assignment of words and figures. As to the time indicated by the 1260 days or 3½ years, the interpretations given have not been convincing, nor even specious. We may observe thus much in this place: that if we regard this prophecy as including long historic periods, we are driven to one of two resources with regard to these numbers: either we must adopt the year-day theory (that which reckons a day for a year, and consequently a month for thirty years,—and should reckon a year for 360 or 365 years), or we must believe the numbers to have merely a symbolical and mystical, not a chronological force. If [and this second alternative is best stated in an inverse form] we regard the periods mentioned as to be literally accepted, then the prophecy cannot refer to long historic periods, but must be limited to a succession of incidents concentrated in one place and space of time either in the far past or in the far future. Of all prophecies about which these questions can be raised, the present is the one which least satisfactorily admits of such literal interpretation and its consequences. Its actors, the woman and the dragon, are beyond all controversy mystical personages: one of them is expressly interpreted for us to be the devil: respecting the other there can be little doubt that she is the Church of God: her seed being, as expressly interpreted to be, God's Christian people. The conflict then is that between Satan and the church. Its first great incident is the birth and triumph of the Son of God and of man. Is it likely that a few days or years will limit the duration of a prophecy confessedly of such wide import? I own it seems to me that this vision, even if it stood alone, is decisive against the literal acceptance of the stated periods. Rejecting that, how do we stand with regard to the other alternative in its two forms? Granting for the moment the year-day principle, will it help us here? If we take the flight into the wilderness as happening at any time between the Ascension, A.D. 30, and the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70, 1260 years will bring us to some time between A.D. 1290 and 1330: a period during which no event can be pointed out as putting an end to the wilderness-state of the church. If again we enlarge our limit for the former event, and bring it down as late as Elliott does, i.e. to the period between the fourth and seventh centuries, we fall into all the difficulties which beset his most unsatisfactory explanation of the man-child and his being caught up to God's throne, and besides, into this one: that if the occultation of true religion [the condition of the invisible church] was the beginning of the wilderness-state, then either the open establishment of the Protestant churches was the end of the wilderness-state of concealment, or those churches are no true churches: either of which alternatives would hardly be allowed by that author. And if on the other hand we desert the year-day principle, and say that these defined and constantly recurring periods are not to be pressed, but indicate only long spaces of time thus pointed out mystically or analogically, we seem to incur danger of missing the prophetic sense, and leaving unfixed that which apparently the Spirit of God intended us to ascertain. And the dragon was wroth at the woman and departed (from his pursuit of her) to make war with the rest of her seed, who keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus (as in ch. vi. 9: see note there. Notice as important elements for the interpretation, 1) That the woman has seed besides the Man-child who was caught up to God's throne [for this is the reference of the rest], who are not only distinct from herself, but who do not accompany her in her flight into the wilderness: 2) That those persons are described as being they who keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus: 3) That during the woman's time of her being fed in the wilderness, the dragon is making war, not against her, but against this remnant of her seed: 4) That by the form of expression here, descriptive of habit, and occurring at the breaking off of the vision as regards the general description of the dragon's agency, it is almost necessarily implied, that the woman, while hidden in the wilderness from the dragon's wrath, goes on bringing forth sons and daughters thus described.

If I mistake not, the above considerations are fatal to the view which makes the flight of the woman into the wilderness consist in the withdrawal of God's true servants from the world and from open recognition. For thus she must be identical with this remnant of her seed, and would herself be the object of the dragon's hostile warfare, at the very time when, by the terms of the prophecy, she is safely hidden from it. I own that I have been led by these circumstances to think whether after all the woman may represent, not the invisible church of God's true people which under all conditions of the world must be known only to Him, but the true visible Church; that Church which in its divinely prescribed form as existing at Jerusalem was the mother of our Lord according to the flesh, and which continued as established by our Lord and His Apostles, in unbroken unity during the first centuries, but which as time went on was broken up by evil men and evil doctrines, and has remained, unseen, unrealized, her unity an article of faith, not of sight, but still multiplying her seed, those who keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus, in various sects and distant countries, waiting the day for her comely order and oneness again to be manifested—the day when she shall “come up out of the wilderness, leaning on her Beloved:” when our Lord's prayer for the unity of His being accomplished, the world shall believe that the Father has sent Him. If we are disposed to carry out this idea, we might see the great realization of the flight into the wilderness in the final severance of the Eastern and Western churches in the seventh century, and the flood cast after the woman by the dragon in the irruption of the Mahometan armies. But this, though not less satisfactory than the other interpretations, is as unsatisfactory. The latter part of the vision yet waits its clearing up).

The heads are [see for the interpretation ch. xvii. 9, 10, where it is given by the angel] Kings, in the widest acceptance of the word; Kings, as representing their kingdoms; not necessarily individual Kings (see as above):—the name or names of blasphemy, the divine titles given to those Kings, “Lord of the whole earth,” and the like: in the Roman form, “Deus” or “Divus.” Hereafter, when the great harlot succeeds to the character and symbolic details of the beast, this is carried yet further). And the beast which I saw was like to a leopard, and its feet as of a bear (see refl.), and its mouth as the mouth of a lion (thus uniting in itself the three previous kingdoms of Dan. vii. 4 ff., the first of which was like a lion, the second like a bear, the third like a leopard ; and in consequence representing, not the Roman Empire merely, but the aggregate of the Empires of this world as opposed to Christ and His kingdom). And the dragon gave to it his might and his throne and great power (i. e. this beast, this earthly persecuting power, was the vicegerent and instrument of the devil, the prince of this world, and used by him for his purposes of hostility against the remnant of the seed of the woman). And [I saw] one among his heads as it were wounded unto death (this seems to represent the Roman pagan Empire, which having long been a head of the beast, was crushed and to all appearance exterminated), and the stroke of its death was healed (in the establishment of the Christian Roman Empire. The period now treated of is the same, introduced here by anticipation, but hereafter to be described in detail, as that during which the woman sits on the beast and guides it. Very many Commentators have explained these seven heads as individual kings, and supposed the one who was wounded to death to be Nero, and these last words to allude to the idea that Nero would return from the dead and become antichrist. But this idea was certainly not prevalent in this form at the time when the Apocalypse was written. Tacitus merely relates, that there were many rumours about Nero's death, and that in consequence many feigned or believed that he was alive, and that on the strength of this, a Pseudo-Nero arose in the East. The first who mentions the idea of Nero returning from the dead, is Augustine, in explaining 2 Thess. ii. 3 ff. But it is observable that Augustine does not connect the idea with the Apocalypse. This is first done by Sulpicius Severus, and completed by Victorinus, whose very words betray the origin of the idea having been from this passage itself). And the whole earth wondered after (wondered at, as they followed, or gazed, after) the beast, and worshipped the dragon, because he gave the (or, his) power to the beast, and worshipped the beast, saying, Who is like to the beast ? And who is able to war with him (these words are a sort of parody, in their blasphemy, on ascriptions of praise to God : compare Exod. xv. 11 ; Ps. xxxv. 10 ; lxxi. 19 ; exii. 5 ; Isa. xl. 18, 25 ; xlv. 5 ; Jer. xxix. 20 [xl. 19] ; Micah vii. 18 : they represent to us the relapse into all the substantial blasphemies of paganism under the resuscitated Empire of Rome, and the retention of pagan titles and forms. I may remark, that nothing in those words finds any representative in the history of the times of the Pagan Empire) ? These vv. 6, 7, in fact expand into detail that which ver. 5 gave compendiously) for blasphemies against God, to blaspheme His name and His tabernacle, which dwell in heaven (the apposition is strange, but if the and must be omitted, the meaning is to enhance the enormity of the blasphemy by bringing out the lofty nature of God's holy Name and dwelling-place). And there was given to it (or him: so throughout) to make war with the saints and to conquer them (see ch. xi. 7, of which this is a wider statement): and there was given to it power over every tribe and people and tongue and nation (viz. universal empire). And all shall worship it who dwell upon the earth, [every one] whose (the change into the singular arises from resolving all into its component individuals) name is not written in the book of life of the Lamb which is slain from the foundation of the world (these last words are ambiguously placed. They may belong either to is written, or to is slain. The former connexion is taken by many. But the other is far more obvious and natural: and had it not been for the apparent difficulty of the sense thus conveyed, the going so far back as to is written for a connexion would never have been thought of. The difficulty of the saying is but apparent: 1 Pet. i. 19, 20 says more fully the same thing. That death of Christ which was fore-ordained from the foundation of the world, is said to have taken place in the counsels of Him with whom the end and the beginning are one. Ch. xvii. 8, which is cited by De Wette as decisive for his view, is irrelevant. Of course, where simply the writing in the book of life from the foundation of the world is expressed, no other element is to be introduced: but it does not therefore follow, that where, as here, other elements are by the construction introduced, that, and that alone is to be understood).

9, 10.] These verses bear various meanings, according to the reading which we adopt. If the ordinary text, represented in the A. V., be taken, they express a consolation to the persecuted saints in the form of a law of retribution: the judgment of God will overtake the persecutors, and in that form in which their persecution was exercised. If we take the reading in the text, they form a prophetic declaration how it shall fare with the saints in the day of persecution, and declare also that in holy suffering of captivity and death consists their faith and patience. The latter appears to

† The readings in this passage are in great confusion. That in the text is, as far as can be gathered, that of all our ancient MSS. One confusing element is, that in two, the Parisian and Sinaitic, the transcribers have passed by mistake from the first occurrence of captivity to the second. But no one of the most ancient MSS. reads as the *A. me, both from critical and contextual considerations, by far the more eligible. Thus we have what is so frequent in this book, an Old Test. citation (see below): and all falls into its place in connexion with the victorious war of the beast against the saints: whereas the other declaration is at least out of place in the context.—If any man hath an ear, let him hear (this notice is given to bespeak solemn attention to what follows, as warning Christians of their fate in the days of the beast's persecution). If any one is for captivity, into captivity he goeth: if any to be slain with the sword (i. e. it is necessary that, as the other reading supplies), he must be slain with the sword (so Jer. xv. 2, "Such as are for death, to death: and such as are for the sword, to the sword: and such as are for the famine, to the famine: and such as are for captivity, to captivity:" compare also Jer. xliii. 11 and Zech. xi. 9. As that was the order and process of God's anger in his judgments on his people of old, so shall the issue be with the saints in the war of persecution which the beast shall wage with them). Here is (viz. in the endurance of these persecutions) the endurance and the faith of the saints.

11—17.] THE SECOND WILD-BEAST, THE REVIVER AND THE UPHOLDER OF THE FIRST. It may be well to premise a few remarks, tending to the right understanding of this portion of the prophecy. 1) These two beasts are identical as to genus: they are both wild-beasts, ravaging powers, hostile to God's flock and fold. 2) They are diverse in origin. The former came up out of the sea: that is, if we go back to the symbolism of Daniel, was an empire, rising up out of confusion into order and life: the latter comes out of the earth: i. e. we may not unreasonably say, arises out of human society and its progress: which, as interpreted by the context, will import its origin and gradual development during the reign and progress of the secular empire denoted by the former beast. 3) The second beast is, in its zeal and action, entirely subsidiary to the first. It wields its authority, works miracles in its support, causes men to make and to worship its image; nay, itself is lost in the splendour and importance of the other. 4) An important distinction exists between the two beasts, in that this second one has two horns like a lamb. In other words, this second beast puts on a mild and lamb-like appearance, which the other did not. But it speaks as a dragon: its words, which carry its real character, are fierce and unrelenting: while it professes that which is gentle, its behests are cruel. And now I may appeal to the reader, whether all these requisites do not meet in that great wasting Power which arose, not out of anarchy and conquest, but out of men's daily life and habits, out of and in the presence of the last form of the secular power, which was the Empire of Pagan Rome; I mean, the sacerdotal persecuting power, which, gentle in its aspect and professions, was yet cruel in its actions; which did all the deeds of the Empire, in its presence, which kept up its image, its laws, its formulae, its privileges; which, coming in as it did by a corrupt and ambitious priesthood, deceived by its miracles the dwellers on earth, and by them maintained the image of the despotic secular power? Surely it is this Latin Christianity, in its ecclesiastico-secular form, not identical with, but as preparing the way for, the great apostasy, helping, so to speak, to place the woman on the beast, as in ch. xvii., that is here depicted before us. It is this which, owing its power in the main to imposture and unwarrantably assumed spiritual authority, deserves best the name of the false prophet, expressly given to this second beast in ch. xix. 20. Nor would I limit the interpretation, as has generally been done, by dividing off Pagan from Christian. Primarily, this second beast plainly sets forth the Pagan sacerdotal power; this it was that made the image of the Emperors, that compelled Christians to worship that image, that wrought signs and wonders by its omens and magic. But as the first beast, still subsisting, has passed into a so-called Christian Roman Empire, so has the second beast into a so-called Christian priesthood, the veritable inheritor of pagan rites, images, and superstitions; actually the continuators, under a different name, of the same worship in the same places; that of the Virgin for that of Venus, Cosmas and Damian for Romulus and Remus, the image of Peter for that of Jupiter Tonans: lamb-like in profession, with the names and appearances of Christianity, but dragon-like in word and act. And this was surely never more strikingly shewn than at the times when I am writing, when the Papal priesthood is zealously combining in the suicidal act of upholding the temporal power, as necessary to the spiritual pre-eminence of their "Lord God the Pope." So that I believe the interpretation of the second beast to be, the sacerdotal persecuting power, pagan and Christian, as the first is the secular persecuting power, pagan or Christian. I conceive the view which would limit it to the priesthood of Paganism quite insufficient for the importance of the prophecy; while that of Elliott, &c., which would limit it to the priesthood of the Papacy, fails notably in giving a meaning to its acts as here described, the making an image to the beast and causing men to worship it. And I saw another wild-beast coming up out of the earth (see the preceding note), and it had two horns like a lamb (i. e. like the two horns of a lamb: see ref. It is quite true that the absence of the definite article before the word lamb forbids the idea that a direct comparison is intended between this lamb-like beast, and the Lamb on Mount Sion: but it does not follow from this that no reference is made to that Lamb in the choice of the animal to which this beast is compared. I believe the choice is made to set forth the hybrid character of this second beast: see more below. The number may perhaps be of no special import, but merely inserted to complete the similarity: it, as a lamb has, had two horns), and it spoke as a dragon (here again, we cannot doubt that the term is chosen on account of the dragon which has been before mentioned. It is no objection to this, that we do not hear of that dragon speaking: the character of the animal explains what kind of speech is meant, and the acts of the dragon were of that kind. And as to this second beast, though its appearance and profession are sacerdotal, its words and acts are devilish. The whole description strongly recalls to our mind our Lord's warning, "Beware of false prophets which come unto you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves," Matt. vii. 15). And it worketh all the power (performs all the acts of authority) of the first beast in his presence (while the first beast is subsisting and beholding; and as the expression seems to shew, being in a relation to it of serving and upholding), and maketh the earth and those that dwell in it to worship the first beast, whose wound of death was healed (this was formerly, ver. 4, described as the reason why the world wondered after the former beast): and worketh great miracles, so that (it is notorious enough that the great arm of

<sup>14</sup>and deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast, which had the wound by a sword, and did live. <sup>15</sup>And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed. <sup>16</sup>And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and support of the sacerdotal power, pagan and papal, has ever been the claim to work miracles) it even maketh fire to come down from the heaven to the earth in the sight of men (it is probable that this special miracle is mentioned to recall the spirit and power of Elias, and shew how the false prophet shall counterfeit the true), and deceiveth those who dwell on the earth on account of (the words express not the instrument, but the ground of the deceit: the imposture succeeds, because of . . .) the miracles which it was given to him to work in the presence of the beast, ordering those who dwell on the earth to make an image to the beast who hath the stroke of the sword, and lived (this part of the prophecy seems to describe the acts of the pagan sacerdotal power then presently to follow. See more below). And it was given to him to give breath (or, spirit; by inference, life) to the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should even speak, and should cause that as many as do not worship the image of the beast should be slain. The Seer is now describing facts which history substantiates to us in their literal fulfilment. The image of Caesar was every where that which men were made to worship: it was before this that the Christian martyrs were brought to the test, and put to death if they refused the act of adoration. The words of Pliny's letter to Trajan are express on the point: "When they called on the gods at my dictation, and offered incense and wine to thine image (which for this purpose I had ordered to be brought with those of the gods), and besides cursed Christ, which it is said that no true Christian can be compelled to do, I thought fit to dismiss them." Above he had said, "those who persevered [in their Christianity] I ordered to be led to execution." And if it be said as an objection to this, that it is not an image of the Emperor but of the beast itself which is spoken of, the answer is very simple, that as the Evangelist himself, in ch. xvii. 11, does not hesitate to identify one of the seven kings with the beast itself, so we may fairly assume that the image of the beast for the time being would be the image of the reigning Emperor.

It is not so easy to assign a meaning to the giving life and speech to the image of the beast. Victorinus gives a curious explanation: "he shall also cause that a golden image to Antichrist shall be erected in the temple at Jerusalem, and a fallen angel shall enter and thence utter voices and give oracles." The allusion probably is to some lying wonders permitted to the Pagan priests to try the faith of God's people. We cannot help, as we read, thinking of the moving images, and winking and speaking pictures, so often employed for purposes of imposture by their far less excusable Papal successors. And he (i. e. the second beast, more naturally than the

The subject to the verb is left uncertain: it will naturally be understood to be, those whose office it is) a mark (such a mark as masters set on their slaves, or monarchs on their soldiers, a brand, stamped or burnt in, see note on Gal. vi. 17. We read in 3 Mace. ii. 29, of Ptolemy Philopater, that he ordered the Jews in Alexandria to be forcibly enrolled, and when enrolled, to be marked with a red-hot brand on their body, with the sign of Bacchus the Ivy-wearer. And Philo mentions idolaters who confessed their idolatry by branding themselves with indelible marks) on their right hand (on which part soldiers were branded), or upon their forehead (i. e. in some conspicuous part of the body, that all may see it: or as Augustine says, "in the forehead for profession: in the hand for operation"), and that no one should be able to buy or to sell, except he who has the mark, the name of the beast, or the number of his name (either in the name stamped in letters, or in the number of the name thus stamped, i. e. the number which those letters make when added together according to their numerical value. The practice of thus calculating the numerical value of the letters in names was widely prevalent: see the instances collected by Mr. Elliott, vol. iii. pp. 220 ff.: and more below.

This particular in the prophetic description seems to point to the commercial and spiritual interdicts which have, both by Pagan and by Papal persecutors, been laid on non-conformity: from even before the interdict of Diocletian, through those of the middle ages [both which ran in nearly these very terms], down to the last remaining civil disabilities imposed on non-conformity in modern Papal or Protestant countries. For these last have their share in the enormities of the first and second beasts, in as far as they adopt or continue their practices.

With regard to the circumstance of the imposition of the mark, I conceive that with the latitude here given, viz., that it may be the name or the number, and having regard to the analogy of the mark inscribed on the saints [ch. xiii. 1: compare ch. vii. 1 ff.], we need not be anxious to find other than a general and figurative interpretation. As it is clear that in the case of the servants of God no actual visible mark is intended, so it may well be inferred here that the mark signifies rather conformity and addition to the behests of the beast, than any actual stigma impressed. Certainly we fail to recognize any adequate exposition of such stigma in the sign of the Cross as propounded by Mr. Elliott [iii. 236], or in the monogram on the labarum as succeeded by the Papal cross-keys, of Dr. Wordsworth [Apocalypse, Appendix G]. Here is wisdom (these words serve to direct attention to the challenge which follows: see ver. 10 and ch. xiv. 12, where here is similarly used): let him who hath understanding calculate the number of the beast (the terms of the challenge serve at once to shew that the feat proposed is possible, and that it is difficult. Irenæus's view, that if St. John had meant the number to be known he would have declared it, and that of Andreas, "time shall reveal it," are, it seems to me, excluded by these considerations. The number may be calculated: and is intended to be known): for (gives a reason why the calculation may be made) it is the number of a man (i. e. is counted as men generally

And that one is the word mentioned, though not adopted, by Irenæus, lateinos, the Greek letters of which, by their numerical power, make up the required number. This name describes the common character of the rulers of the former Pagan Roman Empire, for, says Irenæus, "they are Latins who now rule," and, which Irenæus could not foresee, unites under itself the character of the latter Papal Roman Empire also, as revived and kept up by the agency of its false prophet the priesthood. The Latin Empire, the Latin Church, Latin Christianity, have ever been its commonly current appellations: its language, civil and ecclesiastical, has ever been Latin: its public services, in defiance of the most obvious requisite for public worship, have ever been throughout the world conducted in Latin: there is no one word which could so completely describe its character, and at the same time unite the ancient and modern attributes of the two beasts, as this. Short of saying absolutely that this was the word in St. John's mind, I have the strongest persuasion that no other can be found approaching so near to a complete solution. See however the remarks on this subject in the Introduction, § v. par. 32, where I have after all thought it best to leave the matter in doubt).

CH. XIV. 1—20.] THE CONTRAST: THE BLESSEDNESS, AND THE COUNTER-AGENCY OF THE SAINTS OF GOD. THE HARVEST AND THE VINTAGE OF THE EARTH. This is not entirely another vision, but an introduction of a new element, one of comfort and joy, upon the scene of the last. And thus it must be viewed: with reference to the persecution by the beast which is alluded to in its course, vv. 9 ff. It is also anticipatory, first containing reference to the mystic Babylon, hereafter to become the subject of prophecy in detail; and to the consummation of punishment and reward, also to be treated in detail hereafter. It is general in its character, reaching forward close to the time of the end, treating compendiously of the torment of the apostates and the blessedness of the holy dead, and leading, by its concluding section, which treats of the harvest and the vintage of the earth, to the vision of the seven last vials, now immediately to follow.

It naturally divides itself into three sections: of which the first is, 1—5.] The Lamb on Mount Sion, and His hundred and forty-four thousand. And I saw, and behold the Lamb (viz., the same which before was seen in the midst of the throne, ch. v. 6 al.) standing upon the mount Sion (as in ch. xi., the holy city is introduced as the seat of God's true church and worship, so by a similar figure [not the same, for thus Mount Sion would be outside the temple proper, and given to the Gentiles] the holy mountain Sion is now chosen for the site of the display of God's chosen ones with Christ, the Son of David, whose city Zion was), and with Him an hundred and forty-four thousand, having His name and the name of His Father (observe the tacit assumption that all understand Who is imported by the Lamb) written on their foreheads (first observe the contrast: the nations of the earth, constrained to receive the mark of the beast on their forehead and hand, and the Lamb's elect, marked with His name and that of His Father. 144,000 identical with the same number in ch. vii. 4? The presumption certainly is that the same number occurring here, representing as there the elect and first-fruits of the church, here as there also inscribed on their foreheads with the seal of God in the one case, and His Name in the other, must be descriptive of the same body of persons. And this view, if acquiesced in here, will reflect back considerable light on that former vision of the sealing in ch. vii. Those, as these, will represent the first-fruits or choice ones among God's people, as indeed we have treated them in this commentary, and not the totality of those who shall form the great multitude which no man can number. These, as those, are taken to represent the people of God: their introduction serves to place before us the church on the holy hill of Zion, where God has placed His King, as an introduction to the description of her agency in preaching the everlasting Gospel, and her faithfulness amidst persecutions). And I heard a voice out of heaven, as a voice of many waters (reff.), and as a voice of great thunder (ch. vi. 1): and the voice which I heard [was] as of harpers harping with their harps. And they sing [as it were] a new song (i. e. they sing what sounded like a melody unheard before. The subject to they sing is of course not the 144,000, but the heavenly harpers. On the matter of their song, see below) before the throne, and before the four living-beings, and the elders (the whole heavenly symbolism remaining as before, while the visions regarding God's temple and Mount Zion and the holy city are going forward. I would call the attention of the reader to the fact, essential to the right understanding of the vision, that the harpers and the song are in heaven, the 144,000 on earth): and no one was able to learn the song (to apprehend its melody and meaning, so as to accompany it and bear a part in the chorus) except the hundred and forty-four thousand, who were purchased (see ver. 4, and 1 Cor. vi. 20; ch. v. 9) from the earth (the song has regard to matters of trial and triumph, of deep joy and heavenly purity of heart, which none other among men but these pure and holy ones are capable of apprehending. The sweetest and most skillful harmonies convey no pleasure to, nor are they appreciated by an uneducated ear: whereas the experienced musician finds in every chord the most exquisite enjoyment. The unskilled ear, even though naturally distinctive of musical sounds, could not learn nor reproduce them: but both these can be done by those who have ears to hear them. Even so this heavenly song speaks only to the virgin heart, and can be learnt only by those who accompany the Lamb whithersoever He goeth). These are they who were not (the past tense shews that their course is ended and looked back on as a thing past: and serves to confute all interpretations which regard them as representing saints while in the midst of their earthly conflict and trial) defiled with women (see below); for they are (always were and have kept themselves till the time present) virgins (there are two ways of understanding these words. Either they may be figurative, merely implying that these pure ones lived in all chastity, whether in single or in married life, and incurred no pollution [2 Cor. xi. 2]: or they may be meant literally, that these purest ones had lived in that state of which St. Paul says, 1 Cor. vii. 1, it is good for a man. And as between these two meanings I conceive that the emphatic position of the words with women in the original goes some way to decide. It is not the fact of impurity in allowed intercourse, but the fact of commerce with women that is put forward. I would therefore believe that in the description of these who are the first-fruits from the earth, the feature of virginity is to be taken in its literal meaning. Nor need any difficulty be found in this. It is on all hands granted that he who is married in the Lord enters into holy relations of which the single have no experience, and goes through blessed and elevating degrees of self-sacrifice, and loving allowance, and preferring others before himself. And as every step of grace assured is a step of glory secured, there is no doubt that the holy married servants of God shall have a peculiar entrance into the fulness of that future Kingdom's employ, which will not be the lot of the single: seeing that in this matter also, the childhood of this state will be the father of the manhood of that one. But neither on the other hand can it be denied that the state of holy virginity has also its peculiar blessings and exemptions. Of these, the Apostle himself speaks of that absence of distraction from the Lord's work, which is apt to beset the married, busy as they are with the cares of a household and with pleasing one another. And another and primary blessing is, that in them that fountain of carnal desire has never been opened, which is so apt to be a channel for unholy thoughts and an access for the tempter. The virgins may thus have missed the victory over the lusts of the flesh: but they have also in great part escaped the conflict. Theirs is not the triumph of the toil-worn and stained soldier, but the calm and the unspottedness of those who have kept from the strife. We are perhaps more like that which the Lord intended us to be: but they are more like the Lord Himself. And if He is to have round Him a peculiar and closer band, standing with Him on Mount Sion, none will surely grudge this place to those who were not defiled with women. Among these will be not only those who have lived and served Him in holy virginity, but also the dear children whom He has claimed from us for Himself, the youths and maidens who were gathered to His side before the strife began: before their tongues had learned the language of social falsehood, or their good names been tarnished with the breath of inevitable calumny. There is one meaning which these words will not bear, and which it is surprising that any Commentator should ever have attached to them: viz. that with women refers to the woman mentioned below, ch. xvii. So Dr. Wordsworth, p. 284: "They have not been defiled with women. What women? It may be asked. If we proceed, we read of the woman seated on the Beast, and of the harlotry of the woman, with whom the Kings of the earth commit fornication. And soon we see her displayed in all her meretricious splendour. There then is the reply." But the whole context here, as well as the language used, is against it: the following words, for they are virgins, carrying its decisive condemnation). These [are] they that follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth (the description has very commonly been taken as applying to the entire obedience of the elect, following their Lord to prison and to death, and wherever He may call them: but this exposition is surely out of place here, where not their life of conflict, but their state of glory is described. The words are used of special privilege of nearness to the Person of the Lamb in glory). These were purchased from men as a first-fruit to God and to the Lamb (all have been thus purchased: but these specially, as and for the purpose of being a first-fruit. James i. 18 treats of a different matter, the purchased of all the redeemed as the first-fruits of creation. But these are a first-fruit among the purchased themselves). And in their mouth wa, not

The division of the waters into the sea and the fountains is one kept up through this prophecy: compare ch. viii. 8—11, xvi. 3, 4). And another second angel followed (it belongs to the solemnity of this series of proclamations that a separate place and marked distinction should dignify each of them), saying, Babylon the great is fallen, third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, <sup>10</sup> the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: <sup>11</sup> and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name. <sup>12</sup> Here is the pais fallen, which hath made all the nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication (two things are mingled: 1) the wine of her fornication, of which all nations have drunk, ch. xvii. 2: and 2) the wine of the wrath of God which He shall give her to drink, ver. 10, and ch. xvi. 19. The latter is the retribution for the former: the former turns into the latter: they are treated as one and the same. The whole is from Jer. li. 7, 8, where Babylon is a cup in the Lord's hand of which the nations are made to drink. This is the first mention of Babylon, hereafter to be so much spoken of. I reserve treatment of the interpretation till ch. xvii.: only mentioning by anticipation that Rome, pagan and papal, but principally papal, is intended). And another third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any one worshippeth the beast and his image (see above, ch. xiii. 15), and receiveth the mark on his forehead, or upon his hand (ch. xiii. 16), he also (also either 1) may be almost redundant, introducing the latter portion of the sentence merely as an addition to the former, or 2) may mean, as well as Babylon. The former sense seems to me the more probable) shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is mingled (i.e. as A. V. poured into the cup. From the almost universal custom of mixing wine with water, the common term for preparing wine, putting it into the cup, came to be to mingle. Hence the apparent contradiction in terms here [and in the Psalm below]. The figure of the cup of the Lord's wrath is found in Ps. lxxiv. 8, in the Septuagint version, "In the hand of the Lord is a cup, full of the mixture of pure wine... all the sinners of the earth shall drink it," from which this is evidently taken) in the cup of His anger, and shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the [holy] angels and in the presence of the Lamb (see ch. xx. 10, and Isa. in the refl., from which the imagery comes. The meaning is as in Luke xvi. 23 ff., that the torments are visible to the angels and the Lamb): and the smoke of their torment goeth up to ages of ages (see Isa. in the refl., and Gen. xviii. 28, which doubtless is the fountain-head: also ch. xix. 3): and they have not rest (from torment) day and night who worship the beast and his image; and whoever (from speaking collectively the solemn declaration becomes even more solemn by individualizing) receives the mark of his name. Here (viz. in the inference to be drawn from the certainty of everlasting torment to all who worship the beast or receive his mark:

that all the saints of God must refuse to do either) is the endurance of the saints, who keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus (the faith, that is, which has Him for its object). And I heard a voice out of heaven (whose, is not told us, and it is in vain to speculate: certainly not, as Hengstenberg, from the spirits of the just themselves. The command, write, more rather point to the angel who reveals the visions to the Evangelist, ch. i. 1, and compare ch. iv. 4), saying, Write, Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth (the connexion is not difficult. The mention of the endurance of the saints brings with it the certainty of persecution unto death. The present proclamation declares the blessedness of all who die not only in persecution, but in any manner, in the Lord, in the faith and obedience of Christ. And the special command to write this, conveys special comfort to those in all ages of the church who should read it. But it is not so easy to assign a fit meaning to from henceforth. Being thus joined with the former sentence, it must express some reason why this blessedness is to be more completely realized from this time when it is proclaimed, than it was before. Now this reason will quickly appear, if we consider the particular time, in connexion with which the proclamation is made. The harvest of the earth is about to be reaped; the vintage of the earth to be gathered. At this time it is, that the complete blessedness of the holy dead commences: when the garner is filled and the chaff cast out. And that not on account of their deliverance from any purgatorial fire, but because of the completion of this number of their brethren, and the full capacities of bliss brought in by the resurrection. Nor can it legitimately be objected to this, that the deaths implied must follow after the proclamation. For no doubt this would be so, the proclamation itself being anticipatory, and the harvest not yet actually come). Yea, saith the Spirit (the utterance of the voice from heaven still continues. The affirmation of the Spirit ratifies the blessedness proclaimed, and assigns a reason for it), that they shall (so literally) rest from their labours: for their works follow with them (for, which has seemed so difficult, and which apparently gave rise to the alteration in the text, is in fact easily explained. They rest from their labours, because the time of working is over, their works accompanying them not in a life of activity, but in blessed memory; wherefore not labour, but rest is their lot).

fore mentioned: no inference can be drawn from this that the Sitter on the cloud is a mere angel) came out of the temple, crying out in a loud voice to him that sat upon the cloud, Put forth (literally, send: and so in Mark in the reff. De Wette's objection, that the sitter on the cloud cannot be Christ Himself, because He would not be introduced receiving a command from an angel, may be well answered, as Düsterdieck, that the angel is only the messenger of the will of God. And I may add what to me makes this reply undoubtedly valid, that the command is one regarding the times and seasons, which the Father hath kept in his own power) thy sickle (the whole is a remembrance of our Lord's own saying in Mark iv. 29: see below) and reap: because the time to reap is come, because the harvest of the earth is dried (perfectly ripe, so that the stalk is dry: compare Mark iv. 29: also the fields being "white already to harvest," John iv. 35: which they can only become by losing their moisture). And he that sat upon the cloud thrust in his sickle upon (into, from above) the earth, and the earth was reaped (to what does this harvest refer? Is it the ingathering of the wicked, or of the saints, or of both together? Each of these has examples in Scripture symbolism. The first, in Jer. li. 33, where it is said of Babylon, "It is time to thresh her, yet a little while and the time of her harvest is come:" and as appears, Joel iii. 15, though the reference seems rather there to be to the vintage: the second, in Matt. ix. 39, and parallels; Mark iv. 29; John iv. 35; the third, in Matt. xiii. 30, 39. The verdict of commentators is very much divided. There are circumstances in the context which tell both ways. The parallelism with the vintage, which follows, seems to favour a harvest of the wicked: but then on the other hand, if so, what is the distinction between the two ingatherings? and why do we read of the casting into the wine-press of God's wrath in the second case, and of no corresponding feature in the other? Again, why is the agency so different—the Son of man on the white cloud with the golden crown in the one case, the mere angel in the other? Besides, the two gatherings seem quite distinct. The former is over before the other begins. On the whole then, though I would not pronounce decidedly, I much incline to think that the harvest is the ingathering of the saints, God's harvest, reaped from the earth: described here thus generally, before the vintage of wrath which follows. And thus we have at least these two visions in harmony with the character of this section, which contains the mingled agency and fortunes of the Church and of its enemies; thus this harvest answers to the great preaching of the everlasting gospel above, vv. 6, 7, while the following vintage fulfils the denunciations of wrath on those who worship the image or receive the mark of the beast, vv. 8, 11. And thus too we bring this description into harmony with our Lord's important parable in Mark iv. 29, where the very words are used of the agency of Christ Himself when the work of grace is ripe, whether in the individual or in the church. But while thus inclined, I will not deny that the other view, and that which unites both, have very much to be said for them).

17—20.] The vintage of wrath. And another angel (another may perhaps refer to the three angels who have already appeared in this vision: or, which is more probable, referring to the last-mentioned Agent, may be a general term, not necessarily implying that He was a mere angel) came out from the temple which was in heaven (from which come forth God's judgments: see ch. xi. 19), having himself also (as well as that other: but the term rather raises a distinction between the two personages than sets them on an equality: there is some slight degree of strangeness, after what has gone before, in this angel having a sickle) a sharp sickle. And another angel came out from the altar (viz. that elsewhere several times mentioned, ch. vi. 9, viii. 3, xvi. 7, in connexion with the fulfilment of God's judgments in answer to the prayers of His saints), he that hath power over the fire (viz. that on the altar; the same angel who is introduced ch. viii. 3—5 as presenting the prayers of the saints, and casting some of the fire of the altar to the earth as introductory to the judgments of the trumpets), and he cried with a great cry to him that had the sharp sickle (it is to be observed that the whole description of this angel, coming from the altar of vengeance, differs widely from any thing in the former part of the vision, and favours the idea that this vintage is of a different nature from that harvest), saying, Put forth thy sharp sickle, and gather the bunches of the vine of the earth, because her grapes are ripe. And the angel (no such expression is used above, ver. 16. There it is, "He that sat upon the cloud.") All these signs of difference are worthy of notice) thrust in his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, and cast (viz. what he had gathered) into the great winepress of the wrath of God (any thing corresponding to this feature is entirely wanting in the previous description of the harvest. See on it ch. xix. 15, and the prophetic passages in reff. especially Isaiah, from which the symbolism comes). And the winepress was trodden outside the city (see below), and blood (so Isa. lxiii. 3) came forth from the winepress as far as to the bits of the horses, to the distance of a thousand six hundred stadii (it is exceedingly difficult to say what the meaning is, further than that the idea of a tremendous final act of vengeance is denoted. The city evidently is the same as the outer city of ch. xi. 2 [not that of ib. 8, see note there], viz. Jerusalem, where the scene has been tacitly laid, with occasional express allusions such as that in our ver. 1. The blood coming forth from the treading of the winepress is in accordance with the Old Test. prophecy alluded to, Isa. lxiii. 3. It is in the depth, and the distance indicated, that the principal difficulty lies. The number of stadii (or furlongs) is supposed by some to be the length of the Holy Land, as given by Jerome at 160 Roman miles. But the great objection to this is, that 160 miles = 1280, not 1600 stadii. Another view has been, that 1600 has been chosen as a square number, = 40 × 40, or 4 × 400, or 4 × 4 × 100. We may fairly say, either that the number is assigned simply to signify completeness and magnitude [in which case some other apocalyptic numbers which have been much insisted on will fall perhaps under the same canon of interpretation], or else this is one of the riddles of the Apocalypse to which not even a proximate solution has ever yet been given).

CH. XV., XVI. THE SEVEN VIALS. And herein, XV. 1—8.] PREFATORY: the description of the vision, ver. 1: the song of triumph of the saints victorious over the beast, vv. 2—4: the coming forth of the seven angels and delivering to them of the seven vials, vv. 5—8.

And I saw another sign in heaven, great and marvellous, seven angels having seven plagues which are the last [plagues], because in them is completed the wrath of God (I have adopted an unusual arrangement to throw the word because into connexion with the last, for which epithet it renders a reason. It is to be observed 1) that this verse is evidently only a compendious description of the following vision: for the angels themselves are not seen till ver. 6, and do not receive the vials containing the plagues till after they are seen: 2) that the whole of God's wrath in final judgment is not exhausted by these vials, but only the whole of His wrath in sending plagues on the earth previous to the judgment. After these there are no more plagues: they are concluded with the destruction of Babylon. Then the Lord

Himself appears, ch. xix. 11 ff.). And I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire (see ch. iv. 6 and note: not merely glassy: the as it were indicates the likeness: it was as it were made of glass. The addition mingled with fire is probably made as bringing into the previous celestial imagery an element belonging to this portion of the prophecy, of which judgment is the prevailing complexion. The fact, that the personages of the former heavenly vision are still present, ver. 7, seems to remove all doubt of this being the same sea of glass as that before described ch. iv. 6, in immediate connexion with which the four living-beings were mentioned), and the conquerors of (literally, out of: they have come victorious out of the strife) the beast and of his image and of the number of his name (i. e. of the temptation to worship his image and to receive the mark consisting of the number of his name, ch. xiii. 17, 18), standing on (does this import actually "upon," so that they stood on the surface of the sea, or merely on the shore of? On every account the latter seems the more probable: as better suiting the heavenly imagery of ch. iv., and as according with the situation of the children of Israel when they sung the song to which allusion is presently made) the sea of glass, having harps of God (sacred harps, part of the instruments of heaven used solely for the praise of God. We have had them before mentioned in ch. v. 8, xiv. 2). And they sing the song of Moses the servant of God (i. e. a song similar to that song of triumph which

Moses and the children of Israel sung when delivered from the Red Sea and from the Egyptians, Exod. xv. In Exod. xiv. 31, Moses is called, as here, the servant of God [see also Numb. xii. 7; Josh. xxii. 5]: and this song is formed on the model of parts of that one: see below) and the song of the Lamb (it is not meant that there are two distinct songs: the song is one and the same; and the expression which characterizes it betokens, as do so many other notices and symbols in this book, the unity of the Old and New Test. churches. Their songs of triumph have become ours: the song of Moses is the song of the Lamb. In this great victory all the triumphs of God's people are included, and find their fulfilment), saying (the song is a reproduction of several portions of the Old Test. songs of praise), Great and wonderful are thy works (Ps. cxi. 2, cxxxix. 14), Lord God Almighty: just and true are thy ways (Ps. cxlv. 17; Deut. xxxii. 4 in Moses' song), thou King of the nations: who can but fear [Thee] (these two clauses are from Jer. x. 7. The title "King of nations" is especially appropriate, as it is God's judgments on the nations, and their effects on them, which are the theme of the Church's praise) and [who] shall [not] glorify (so literally) thy Name! because Thou only art holy (this first because grounds the question in the attributes of God): because all the nations shall come and worship before thee (so it is declared in Ps. lxxxvi. 9. This second because grounds the question in matter of fact): because Thy righteous acts (thy judgments: thy deeds of righteousness acted out towards the nations, both in the publication of the Gospel and in the destruction of Thine enemies) have been made manifest (this third because grounds the fact announced in its immediately exciting cause—the manifestation of God's judgments). And after these things I saw, and there was opened the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven (see on ch. xi. 19, xvi. 17. The temple (proper) is the holy place of the tabernacle, to which latter the appellation of the testimony is here peculiarly appropriate, seeing that the witness and covenant of God are about to receive their great fulfilment): and there came forth the seven angels (viz. who were before mentioned: the does not point out any particular seven, such as the archangels) which had (or, "having." This was their office: but they had them not yet) the seven plagues out of the temple (see ch. xiv. 15, 17), clad in linen pure and glistening (the well-known clothing of angels and heavenly beings, see Acts x. 30 (i. 10), ch. xix. 8; Matt. xvii. 2 and parallels, xxviii. 3), and girt round their breasts with golden girdles (being in this like our Lord Himself as seen in vision, ch. i. 13). And one from among the four living-beings (appropriately to the symbolic meaning of these living-creatures as the representatives of creation, see notes on ch. iv. 7, 11, inasmuch as the coming plagues are to be inflicted on the objects of creation) gave to the seven angels seven golden vials (the phiale was a shallow bowl or cup, usually without a stand or foot, in which they drew out of the crater or goblet), full of the wrath of God who liveth for ever and ever (this addition serves, as in ch. i. 8, to give solemnity to the fact related). And the temple was filled with smoke from (arising from) the glory of God and from His might (i. e. from His presence, in which His glory and His might were displayed. The description calls to mind similar ones in the Old Test., e. g. Ps. xviii. 8 f.; Isa. lxx. 5. See also below), and no one was able to enter into the temple (compare 1 Kings viii. 10, 11; Exod. xl. 34, 35) until the seven plagues of the seven angels should be finished (the passages above referred to give the reason: because of the unapproachableness of God, when immediately present and working, by any created being. See Exod. xix. 21. When these judgments should be completed, then, the wrathful presence and agency of God being withdrawn, He might again be approached. Many other meanings more or less far-fetched have been given, but where Scripture analogy is so plain, the simplest is the best).

CH. XVI. 1—21.] THE SEVEN VIALS. See the general remarks on ch. viii. 1 for all questions common to the three great series of visions. The following special particulars are here to be noticed: 1) In the description, ch. xvi., which first introduces these plagues, they are plainly called the seven plagues which are the last. There can then be no doubt here, not only that the series reaches on to the time of the end, but that the whole of it is to be placed close to the same time. And this is borne out by the particulars evolved in the course of the visions themselves. For we find that they do not in point of time go back, but at once take up the events of the former visions, and occur during the times of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, when the mystery of God should be finished. 2) As in the seals and in the trumpets, so here again, there is a marked distinction between the first four and the following three. As there, so here, the objects of the first four are the earth, the sea, the springs of waters, and the sun. After this the objects become more particularized: the throne of the beast, the river Euphrates, with the reservation of that peculiar and vague character for the seventh, which seems to belong to it in all the three series. 3) As before, so now, there is a compendious and anticipatory character about several of the vials, leading us to believe that those of which this is not so plain, partake of this character also. For example, under the third vial we find an acknowledgment of the divine justice in making those drink blood who shed the blood of saints and prophets. This, there can be little doubt, points on to the judgment on Babylon, in whom, ch. xviii. 24, was found the blood of saints and prophets, and of all that had been slain on the earth. Again, under the sixth we have the same great gathering to battle which is described in detail, ch. xix. 17—21. And finally, under the seventh, we have a compendious anticipatory notice of the judgment of Babylon, hereafter, ch. xvii., xviii., to be described in detail,—and of the great day itself in ver. 20, also hereafter [ch. xx. 11—15] to be resumed at more length. 4) As we might expect in the final plagues, we have no longer, as in the trumpets, a portion of each element affected, but the whole. 5) While in the first four vials the main features of the first four trumpets are reproduced, there is one notable distinction in the case of the fourth. While by the plague of the fourth trumpet, the sun, moon, and stars are partially darkened, by that of the fourth vial the power of the sun is increased, and the darkening of the Kingdom of the beast is reserved for the fifth.

The minor special features will be noticed as we proceed. On the whole, the series of the vials seems to bear a less general character than the other two. It takes up a particular point in the prophecy, and deals with symbols and persons previously described. It belongs, by its very conditions, exclusively to the time of, or to days approaching very near to the time of, the end: including in itself the subsequent details as far as the end of ch. xx.: without however noticing most important features and considerable prophetic periods.

1.] Introductory. And I heard a great voice out of the temple (from the fact, ch. xv. 8, that the divine Presence is filling the temple, and that none might enter into it, this voice can be no other than the divine voice) saying to the seven angels, Go and pour out the seven vials of the wrath of God into the earth (so, previous to the series of trumpets, the angel casts the fire from the altar into the earth, ch. viii. 5).

2.] And the first departed (each angel, as his turn comes, leaves the heavenly scene, and from the space between heaven and earth, empties his vial on the appointed object) and poured out his vial into the earth (the earth, which before in ver. 1 was general, is now particular, and correlative with the objects of the other vials, compare vv. 2, 3, “into the sea,” “into the waters”): and there came (took place: fell, as A. V.) an evil (in itself) and painful (to the sufferers) sore upon the men that had the mark of the beast and that worshipped his image (see above, ch. xiii. 15—17, xiv. 9, 10. The allegorical and historical interpretations have been very various: see them in Elliott, vol. iv. Notice the parallel with the sixth Egyptian plague, Exod. ix. 8 ff. Compare Deut. xxviii. 27, 35).

3.] And the second poured out his vial into the sea: and it (the sea, compare ch. viii. 8, 11) became blood as of a dead man (blood as when a dead corpse lies in its blood: loathsome and corrupting): and every soul of life (so literally: soul being used in its physical sense of animal soul) died, [all] the things in the sea.

the waters: and they became blood (that the fact was so, is testified by what follows, in which it is assumed that the sources of ordinary drink have become blood). And I heard the angel of the waters (i. e. the angel who was set over the waters; see ch. vii. 1, xiv. 18) saying, Thou art righteous who art and wast (as in ch. xi. 2, the "and art to come" is omitted) holy, because Thou didst judge thus (lit., "these things:" viz. the issue mentioned in ver. 4; the turning the drinking-water into blood: "Thou didst inflict this judgment"): because they shed the blood of saints and prophets, and Thou hast given them blood to drink: they are worthy (these words are made stronger by the absence of any particle to introduce them). And I heard the altar saying (certainly the simplest understanding of these words is, that they involve a personification of the altar. On the altar are the prayers of the saints, offered before God: beneath the altar are the souls of the martyrs crying for vengeance: when therefore the altar speaks, it is the concentrated testimony of these which speaks by it), Even so, Lord God Almighty, true and just are Thy judgments.

8, 9.] And the fourth poured out his vial upon (no longer into) the sun: and it was given to it (the sun: not "to him," the angel, as, strangely enough, Bengel and Hengstenberg, and Elliott. The angels throughout this vision are simply the pourers out of the vials, not the executors of the plagues. Besides which, the verb to scorch, in a sentence where the sun is mentioned can have but one reference) to scorch men with fire (not, as Hengstenberg, understanding him of the angel, some fire other than the sun: but the glowing increased heat of the sun itself), and men were scorched with great heat, and blasphemed the name of God, who hath power over these plagues, and did not repent to give Him glory.

on the spot where the power and presence of the beast had its proper residence): and his kingdom (those lands which owned his rule) became darkened (as in the ninth Egyptian plague, Exod. x. 21 ff., the darkness is specially sent over the land, not occasioned by any failure of the lights of heaven). And they (the inhabitants: the subjects of the beast. They are by and by identified with those who had received his mark) chewed their tongues (which, says Andreas, is a sign of excessive and intolerable pain) from their pain (viz. under which they were previously suffering: not, that occasioned by the darkness, which would not of itself occasion pain: see below), and blasphemed the God of heaven (see ch. xi. 13) by reason of their pains and their sores (these words bind on this judgment to that of the first and following vials, and shew that they are cumulative, not simply successive. The sores, and pains before mentioned, are still in force), and repented not of their works.

12. And the sixth poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates: and its water was dried up, that the way of the kings which come from the rising of the sun might be prepared (notice, but not to be blindly led by it, the analogy of the sixth trumpet, also having reference to the river Euphrates. In order to understand what we here read, we must carefully bear in mind the context. From what follows under this same vial, we learn that the kings of the whole earth are about to be gathered together to the great battle against God, in which He shall be victorious, and they shall utterly perish. The time is now come for this gathering: and by the drying up of the Euphrates, the way of those kings who are to come to it from the East is made ready. This is the only understanding of these words which will suit the context, or the requirements of this series of prophecies. For to suppose the conversion of Eastern nations, or the gathering together of Christian princees, to be meant, or to regard the words as relating to any auspicious event, is to introduce a totally incongruous feature into the series of vials, which confessedly represent the "seven last plagues." Andreas explains it as above: and so Bleek, Ewald, De Wette, Düsterd., and others).

13—16.] And I saw out of the mouth of the dragon (who is still in the prophetic scene, giving his power to the beast, ch. xiii. 2) and out of the mouth of the beast and out of the mouth of the false prophet (viz. the second beast of ch. xiii. 11 ff. Compare ch. xix. 20, xx. 10) three unclean spirits like frogs (in shape and character. The explanation of these as any men, or sects of men, is therefore clearly wrong) which go forth over the kings of the whole earth (it is the uniform testimony of the prophetic Scriptures, that the antichristian power shall work signs and wonders as means of deceiving mankind: see Matt. xxiv. 24; 2 Thess. ii. 9) to gather them together to the war of that great day of Almighty God (that day viz. which is explained in detail in the subsequent part of the prophecy, ch. xix. 17 ff. This great gathering of the beast and the kings of the earth against God and the Lamb, is the signal for the immediate and glorious appearing of the Lord. And therefore follows an exhortation to be ready, and clad in the garments of righteousness, when He shall come). Behold, I come (the Seer speaks in the name of Christ) as a thief (that personal advent shall happen when many least expect it, when the world is secure in the ungodliness of ages): blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they (men) see his shame (the figure is that of one apprehending the thief's coming, and therefore keeping watch in his clothes, not undressing. In the spiritual sense, the garments are the robe of righteousness put on by faith in Him who is our Righteousness: and the walking naked is that destitution of these garments which will at that day bring shame before assembled men and angels). And they (the unclean spirits, as is evident from gathered them being merely a recital of the purpose, to gather them, announced in ver. 14: not, the angel of the sixth vial, as Bengel; nor God, as Hengstenberg and Ebrard) collected them together to the place which is called in Hebrew Harmagedon (it is evidently in the meaning of the Hebrew name of this place that its appropriate significance lies. For otherwise why should in Hebrew be prefixed to it? When St. John does this in his Gospel, in the cases of Bethesda, v. 2, Gabbatha, xix. 13, Golgotha, xix. 17, and in this book in the case of Abaddon, ix. 11, it is each time not without such reference: see the notes in those places. But this circumstance does not deprive the name of geographical reality: and it is most probable on every account that such reality exists here. The words the place which is called would surely not be used except of a real place habitually so named, or by a name very like this. Nor need we search far for the place pointed out. Harmagiddo, the 'mountain of Megiddo,' designates at least the neighbourhood where the Canaanitish Kings were overthrown by Barak, Judg. v. 19: an occasion which gave rise to one of the two triumphal songs of Israel recorded in the Old Test., and therefore one well worthy of symbolizing the great final overthrow of the Kings of the Earth leagued against Christ. That the name slightly differs from that given in the Old Test. where it is the plain [2 Chron. xxxv. 22] or the waters [Judges, as above] of Megiddo, is of slight consequence, and may be owing to a reason which I shall dwell on below. The Septuagint in both places adopts the form which we have here, Megiddo or -eddo. Nor must it be forgotten, that Megiddo was connected with another overthrow and slaughter, viz. that of Josiah by Pharaoh-Necho [2 Kings xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. as above], which though not analogous to this predicted battle in its issue, yet served to keep up the character of the place as one of overthrow and calamity: compare also Zech. xii. 11, and the striking description, 2 Chron. xxxv. 25, of the ordinance of lamentation for Josiah. At Megiddo also another Jewish King, Ahaziah, died of the wounds received from Jehu, 2 Kings ix. 27. The prefix Har, signifying "mountain," has its local propriety: see Stanley's description of the plain of Esdraelon, in the opening of his Sinai and Palestine, ch. ix. And to the fisherman of the lake of Galilee, who would know Megiddo, as he saw its background of highland lit up by the morning or evening sun across the plain from his native hills, the name would doubtless be a familiar one. Still there may have been a deeper reason which led to, or at all events justified the prefix. As the name now stands, it has a meaning ominous of the great overthrow which is to take place on the spot).

17—21.] And the seventh poured out his vial upon the air (the consequences are presently seen), and there came forth a voice out of the temple from the throne (the voice, as in ver. 1, of God himself. This is rendered even more certain here by the addition of from the throne), saying, It is done (the limitation of the meaning to "that is done which was commanded," viz. the outpouring of the seven vials, is in fact no limitation; for the plagues are the last plagues: if therefore they are done, all is done. But the declaration is of course made in anticipation, and imports that the outpouring of the seventh vial had done that which should accomplish all and bring in the end. One who had fired a train would say, "It is done," though the explosion had not yet taken place). And there were lightnings and voices and thunders (the usual accompaniments at the close of each series of visions, see ch. viii. 5, xi. 19. But as before remarked, these phenomena occur here in rather a different connexion from that in the other two places. Here, they are more the result of the outpouring of the last vial, and they do not conclude, but only begin its effects, which do not cease until the destruction of Babylon and the great overthrow of the antichristian hosts): and there was a great earthquake (this may perhaps be not without connexion with the pouring out of the vial into the air: in the descriptions of earthquakes we read of the darkened and lurid appearance of the air preceding the shock), such as was not from the time when there was a man (not, "since man was") upon the earth, such an earthquake, so great. And the great city (Rome: compare ch. xi. 8 and note, xiv. 8, xvii. 18, xviii. 10, 16, 18, &c., 21) became into (i. e. was divided or split, viz., by the earthquake, into) three parts (see ch. xi. 13, where a similar judgment takes place at the end of the episode of the two witnesses. The three parts are supposed by Düsterd. to refer to the three arch-enemies just now mentioned. But this is very uncertain: see on the tripartite division at ch. viii. 7), and the cities of the nations fell (not only the greatest city,

The destruction of the material city of Rome is but the beginning of the execution of vengeance on the mystic Babylon) was remembered before God, to give her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of His wrath (see on the figure of the cup, ch. xiv. 8, note. The sense is, that all these material judgments were but pre-fatory; the divine intent, in the midst of them, being to make Babylon drink the cup of His wrath in her judgment which follows): and every island fled (the effects of the earthquake are resumed, the mention of Babylon coming into remembrance being parenthetical, and suggested by the great city having been split into three parts. On the sense, as belonging to the imagery of the Great Day, see ch. vi. 14), and there were found no mountains (not as A.V., "the mountains were not found." The expression is far stronger than this: amounting to that in ch. vi. 14, that every mountain was removed out of its place and was looked for in vain), and a great hail (see reft. Egypt is again in view) as of a talent in weight (i. e. having each hail-stone of that weight. Diodorus Siculus speaks of hailstones of a mina each in weight as being enormous: and the talent contained sixty minæ. Josephus speaks of the stones which were thrown from the machines in the siege of Jerusalem as each of a talent weight) descendeth from heaven on men: and men blasphemed God by reason of the plague of the hail, because great is the plague of it exceedingly (i. e. mankind in general,—not those who were struck by the hailstones, who would instantly die,—so far from repenting at this great and final judgment of God, blasphemed him and were impenitent. The issue is different from that in ch. xi. 13, where the remnant feared, and gave glory to God).

earth have been made drunk from the wine of her fornication (the figure here used, of a harlot who has committed fornication with secular kings and peoples, is frequent in the prophets, and has one principal meaning and application, viz. to God's church and people that had forsaken Him and attached herself to others. In eighteen places out of twenty-one where the figure occurs, such is its import; viz. in Isa. i. 21; Jer. ii. 20, iii. 1, 6, 8; Ezek. xvi. 15, 16, 28, 31, 35, 41, xxiii. 5, 19, 44; Hosea ii. 5, iii. 3, iv. 15 [Micah i. 7]. In three places only is the word applied to heathen cities: viz. in Isa. xxiii. 15, 16 to Tyre, where, ver. 17, it is also said, "she shall commit fornication with all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth:" and in Nahum iii. 4 to Nineveh, which is called the well-favoured harlot, the mistress of witchcrafts, that selleth nations through her whoredoms, and families through her witchcrafts. And there the threat is pronounced of a very similar ruin to that which befalls Babylon here. So that the Scripture analogy, while it points to unfaithfulness and treachery against God's covenant, also brings to mind extensive empire and wide-spread rule over the kingdoms of the earth. It is true, that as far as the image itself is concerned, pagan Rome as well fulfils its requirements as Tyre and Nineveh. It will depend on subsequent features in the description whether we are to bound our view with her history and overthrow. Still, it will not be desirable to wait for the solution of this question till we arrive at the point where those features appear: for by so doing much of our intermediate exegesis will necessarily be obscured. The decisive test then which may at once be applied to solve the question, is derived from the prophecy of the destruction of Babylon in ch. xviii. 2. It is to be laid utterly waste, and to "become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird." Now no such destruction as this has yet befallen Rome, unless her transfer from pagan to papal rule be such a destruction, and the Pope and his ecclesiastics be described in the above terms. In an eloquent passage of Vitringa, he presses Bossuet with this dilemma. Again, it is said of this harlot, "with whom the kings of the earth committed fornication." But we may ask, if this be pagan Rome, who and what are these kings, and what is indicated by her having been the object of their lustful desires? In the days of Imperial Rome, there were no independent kings of the earth except in Parthia and Persia. Rome in her pagan state, as described for the purpose of identification in ver. 18, was not one who intrigued with the kings of the earth, but "she which hath kingdom over the Kings of the earth:" she reigned over them with undisputed and crushing sway.

I do not hesitate therefore, induced mainly by these considerations, which will be confirmed as we proceed step by step in the prophecy, to maintain that interpretation which regards papal and not pagan Rome as pointed out by the harlot of this vision.

The "sitting upon many waters" is said of Babylon in Jer. in ref., but has here a symbolical meaning; see below, ver. 15. On the drunkenness see ch. xiv. 8. The same thing is said of Babylon in Jer. l. c. But there she herself is the cup in the Lord's hand). And he (the angel) carried me away to the wilderness (not, as Elliott and others, and even Düsterdieck, "a wilderness." The most natural way of accounting for the Seer being taken into the wilderness here, is that he was to be shewn Babylon, which was in the wilderness, and the overthrow of which, in the prophecy from which come the very words "Babylon is fallen, is fallen" [Isa. xxi. 9], is headed "the vision of the wilderness." So that by the analogy of prophecy, the journey to witness the fall of Babylon would be to the wilderness. The question of the identity of this woman with the woman in ch. xii. is not affected by that of the identity of this wilderness with that) in the spirit (see note on ch. i. 10): and I saw a woman sitting upon a scarlet wild-beast (this beast is introduced as if a new appearance: but its identity with that mentioned before, ch. xiii. 1 ff., is plain as the description goes onward. For not to mention the features which the two have in common, this beast, as soon as described, is ever after mentioned as the beast; and in ch. xix. 19, 20, the identity is expressly established. For there we read, ver. 19, that the beast and the kings of the earth make war against the Lamb, which beast can be no other than this on which the woman rides, cf. our vv. 12—14:—and in the next verse, xix. 20, we read that the beast was taken, and the false prophet who did miracles before him, which beast can be no other than that of ch. xiii. See ver. 14 there. The identity of the two is therefore matter not of opinion, but of demonstration. The differences in appearance doubtless are significant. That with which we are now concerned, the scarlet colour, is to be understood as belonging not to a covering on the beast, but to the beast itself. It is akin to the colour of the dragon, but as that is the redness of fire [see however ch. vi. 4], so is this of blood, with which both the beast and its rider are dyed. It was the colour, see Heb. ix. 19, of the wool to be used in sprinkling the blood of sacrifice. There may be an allusion to the Roman imperial purple: for the robe which was put on our Lord in mockery is described by this same word. But this is more probably conveyed by its own proper word in the next verse. By the woman sitting on the wild-beast, is signified that superintending and guiding power which the rider possesses over his beast: than which nothing could be chosen more apt to represent the superiority claimed and exercised by the See of Rome over the secular kingdoms of Christendom), full of names of blasphemy (the names of blasphemy, which were found before on the heads of the beast only, have now spread over its whole surface. As ridden and guided by the harlot, it is tenfold more blasphemous in its titles and assumptions than before. The heathen world has but its Divi, i. e. “Gods,” in the Cæsars, as in other deified men of note: but Christendom has its “most Christian” and “most faithful” Kings such as Louis XIV. and Philip II.; its “Defenders of the faith” such as Charles II. and James II.; its society of unprincipled intriguers called after the sacred name of our Lord, and working Satan’s work “ad majorem Dei gloriam;” its “holy office” of the Inquisition, with its dens of darkest cruelty; finally its “patrimony of St. Peter,” and its “holy Roman Empire;” all of them and many more, new names of blasphemy, with which the woman has invested the beast. Go where we will and look where we will in Papal Christendom, names of blasphemy meet us. The taverns, the shops, the titles of men and of places, the very insurance badges on the houses are full of them), having seven heads and ten horns (as in its former appearance, ch. xiii. 1; inherited from the dragon, ch. xii. 3. These are presently interpreted: we now return to the description of the woman herself). And the woman was clothed in purple (St. John’s own word, even to its peculiar form, for the mock-imperial robe placed on our Lord: and therefore bearing probably here the same signification; but not in mockery, for the empire is real) and scarlet (see above. This very colour is not without its significance: witness the Cardinals, at the same time the guiding council of the Church and princes of the State), and gilded with gold and with (the word gilded is carried on to other details to which it does not properly belong) precious stones and with pearls (this description needs no illustration for any who have witnessed, or even read of, the pomp of Papal Rome: which, found as it is every where, is concentrated in the city itself), holding a cup of gold in her hand full of abominations and of the impure things of her fornication (this cup is best taken altogether symbolically, and not as the cup in the Mass, which, however degraded by her blasphemous fiction of transubstantiation, could hardly be called by this name, and moreover is not given, but denied by her to the nations of the earth. That she should have represented herself in her medals as holding forth this cup [with the remarkable inscription, "she sits over the whole earth;" see Elliott, vol. iv. p. 30, plate], is a judicial coincidence rather than a direct fulfilment), and [having] upon her forehead a name written (as was customary with harlots), Mystery (is this word part of the name, or not? On the whole it seems more probable that it is. For though no such word would in the nature of things be attached to her forehead as part of her designation, so neither would the description which follows Babylon the great, to which the word mystery seems partly to refer. But whether part of the name or not, the meaning will be the same: viz. that the title following is to be taken in a spiritual and an enigmatical sense: compare ch. i. 20, and 2 Thess. ii. 7), Babylon the great, the mother of the harlots and of the abominations of the earth (i. e. not only first and greatest of these, but herself the progenitress and origin of the rest. All spiritual fornication and corruption are owing to her, and to her example and teaching). And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus (as the Seer contemplates the woman, he perceives that she is drunken: and from what is revealed to him, and from her symbolic colour of blood, he assigns the cause of that intoxication). And I wondered, when I saw her, with great won- der (what was the ground of the Seer's astonishment? One doubtless might be assigned, which would at once account for any degree of such emotion. If this woman is the same as he before saw, who fled into the wilderness from the face of the dragon, "the faithful city become an harlot" [Isa. i. 21], he might well wonder. And certainly there is much in favour of such a supposition. It has been taken up by some considerable expositors, such as Auberlen [on Daniel], who has argued earnestly but soberly for it. There is one objection to it, which has been made more of in this place than perhaps it deserves. It is, that in the Angel's replication to St. John's wonder, no allusion is made to this circumstance as its principal ground. But, it may well be replied, this would be just what we might expect, if the fact of identity were patent. The Seer, versed in the history of man's weakness and depravity, full of Old Test. prophetic thoughts and sayings, would need no solution of the fact itself: this would lie at the ground of his wonder, and of the angel's explanation of the consequences which were to follow from it. Auberlen very properly lays stress on the fact, that the joint symbolism of the wilderness and the woman could not fail to call up in the mind of the Seer the last occasion when the two occurred together: and insists that this symbol must be continuous throughout. Without going so far as to pronounce the two identical, I think we cannot and ought not to lose sight of the identity of symbolism in the two cases. It is surely meant to lie beneath the surface, and to teach us an instructive lesson. We may see from it two prophetic truths: first, that the church on earth in the main will become apostate and faithless, compare Luke xviii. 8: and secondly, that while this shall be so, the apostasy shall not embrace the whole church, so that the second woman in the apocalyptic vision should be absolutely identical with the first. The identity is, in the main, not to be questioned: in formal strictness, not to be pressed. This being so, I should rather regard St. John's astonishment as a compound feeling, occasioned partly by the enormity of the sight revealed to him, partly also by the identity of the symbolism with that which had been the vehicle of a former and altogether different vision).

7—18.] Explanation by the angel of the mystery of the woman and of the beast. And first, 7—14] of the beast. And the angel said to me, Wherefore didst thou wonder? I will tell to thee the mystery (which, be it noted, is but one) of the woman and of the wild-beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and the ten horns. The beast which thou sawest, was, and is not, and shall come up out of the abyss, and goeth to perdition (these words have been a very battle-field for apocalyptic expositors. The principal differing interpretations are far too long to be given at all intelligibly here, but will be seen best in their own works, and compendiously but fairly stated in the notices in Mr. Elliott's fourth volume. What is here required, is that I should give a consistent account of that solution which I have been myself led to adopt. 1) It will not be supposed, with the general view which I have taken of the beast as the secular persecuting power, that I am prepared to accede to that line of interpretation which makes the whole vision merely descriptive of the Seer's own time, and of the Roman em-perors then past, present, and expected. Against such a view it seems to me the whole imagery and diction of the vision protest: and this it will be my endeavour to shew as each of their details comes under my notice. If, as universally acknowledged, our prophecy be a taking up and continuation of that of Daniel, then we are dealing with larger matters and on a wider scale than such a limited interpretation would imply. 2) Nor again, after the meaning assigned above to the harlot and her title, will it be expected that I should agree with those who take her as, according to the letter of our ver. 18, strictly confined in meaning to the material city of Rome. She is that city: but she is also mystery. She is herself a harlot, an apostate and faithless church: but she is also a mother: from her spring, of her nature partake, with her shall be destroyed, all the fornications and abominations of the earth, though they be not in Rome, though they be not called by her name, though in outward semblance they quarrel with and oppose her. 3) The above remarks will lead their intelligent reader to expect, that the present words of our text, which are in the main reproductive of the imagery of ch. xiii. 1—4, will be interpreted as those were interpreted, not of mere passing events and persons, but of world-wide and world-long empires and changes. 4) Having thus indicated the line of interpretation which I shall follow, I reserve the details for ver. 10, where they necessarily come before us): and they shall wonder who dwell upon the earth, of whom the name is not written upon (so literally, as often in this book) the book of life from the foundation of the world (i. e.

written from that time), seeing the beast that he was and is not and shall come again (see for full explanation, below on vv. 9, 10). Here [is] the mind that hath wisdom (by these words, as in ch. xiii. 18, attention is bespoken, and spiritual discernment challenged, for that which follows). The seven heads are seven mountains, where (so literally) the woman sitteth upon them (by these words, no less plainly than by ver. 18, Rome is pointed out. Propertius, by a remarkable coincidence, unites both descriptions in one line: "The city on seven hills, that ruleth all the world." The Latin poets and prose writers are full of similar descriptions. See my Greek Test. and references there. See also the coin of Vespasian figured in Elliott, vol. iv. p. 30): and they are seven kings (let us weigh well the significance of this indication furnished by the angel. The seven heads have a reference to the woman, who sits upon the beast to whom they belong: and, as far as this reference is concerned, they are hills, on which she sits. But they have also another reference—to the beast, of which they are the heads: and as far as this other reference is concerned, they are kings. Not, be it noticed, kings over the woman, nor kings of the city symbolized by her: but kings in a totally different relation, viz. that to the beast of which they are heads. So that to interpret these kings as emperors of Rome, or as successive forms of government over Rome, is to miss the propriety of the symbolism and to introduce utter confusion. They belong to the beast, which is not Rome, nor the Roman Empire, but a general symbol of secular antichristian power. They are in substance the same seven crowned heads which we saw on the dragon in ch. xii. 3: the same which we saw, with names of blasphemy on them, on the beast of ch. xiii. 1, to whom the dragon gave his power and his throne). The five (i.e. the first five out of the seven) fell (in English idiom, "are fallen." Of whom is this word used? Is it one likely to be chosen to describe the mere passing away of king after king in an empire more or less settled? One appropriate to Augustus and Tiberius, who died in their beds? Or again is it one which could well be predicated of the government by consuls, which had been absorbed into the imperial power, or of that by dictators, which had merely ceased to be temporarily adopted, because it had become perpetual in the person of one man? Had Roman emperors been meant by the seven kings, or successive stages of government over Rome [even supposing these last made out, which they never have been], we should in vain have sought any precedent, or any appropriate meaning, for this term, have fallen: "have passed away" would be its constrained and unexampled sense. But let the analogy of Scripture and of this book itself guide us, and our way will be clear enough. "Is fallen, is fallen," is the cry over Babylon herself. The verb is used in the Septuagint constantly, of the violent fall, the overthrow, either of kings or of kingdoms: it is a word belonging to domination overthrown, to glory ruined, to empire superseded. If I understand these five of individual successive kings, if I understand them of forms of government adopted and laid down on occasion, I can give no account of this verb: but if I understand them of forms of empire, one after another heading the antichristian secular power, one after another violently overthrown and done away, I have this verb in its right place and appropriate sense. Egypt is fallen, the first head of the beast that persecuted God's people, Ezek. xxix. xxx.: Nineveh is fallen, the bloody city, Nahum iii. 1—19: Babylon is fallen, the great enemy of Israel, Isa. xxi. 9; Jer. l. li., xl.: Persia is fallen, Dan. x. 13, xi. 2: Græcia is fallen, Dan. xi. 3, 4. Thus, and as it seems to me thus only, can we do justice to the expression. Nor is any force done thus to the word kings, but on the contrary it is kept to its strict prophetic import, and to the analogy of that portion of prophecy which is here especially in view. For in Dan. vii. 17 we read, that these great beasts which are four are four kings, not kingdoms), the one is (the Roman), the other (required to complete the seven) is not yet come (I agree with Auberlen, on Daniel, in regarding this seventh as the Christian empire beginning with Constantine: during whose time the beast in his proper essence, in his fulness of opposition to God and his saints, ceases to be), and when he shall come he must remain a little time (certainly the impression we derive from these words is not as Düsterdieck, al., that his empire is to be of very short continuance, but the term ["a season"], as in 1 Pet. i. 6, v. 10 ["a while"], gives the idea of some space not assigned, but vaguely thus stated as "some little time." The idea given is rather that of duration than non-duration. Here, the stress is on must remain, and not on "a short space:" on the fact of some endurance, not on its being but short). And the beast which was and is not (as in ver. 8, whose peculiar power and essence seem suspended while the empire is Christian by profession. But observe, this seventh is for all that a veritable head, and like the others carries names of blasphemy. The beast is not actually put out of existence, but has only received a deadly wound which is again healed, see ch. xiii. 3, notes), he himself also is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth unto perdition (this eighth, the last and worst phase of the beast, is not represented as any one of his heads, but as being the beast himself in actual embodiment. He is of the seven, —not "one of the seven," but the successor and result of the seven, following and springing out of them. And he goeth into perdition—does not fall like the others, but goes on and meets his own destruction at the hand of the Lord Himself. There can be little doubt in the mind of the student of prophecy, who is thus described: that it is the ultimate antichristian power, prefigured by the little horn in Daniel, and expressly announced by St. Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 3 ff., as "the son of perdition,"—as "the lawless one, whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of His mouth, and destroy with the appearance of His coming"). And the ten horns which thou sawest, are ten kings (not necessarily personal kings: see on ver. 10 above: but kingdoms, regarded as summed up in their kings) which (kings of that kind who) have not yet received a kingdom, but receive power as kings (the term, as kings, is somewhat enigmatical. Auberlen suggests, whether the kingly power itself may not have passed away from these realms in the days of antichristian misrule, and thus their power be only as kings. But this seems inconsistent with their being called kings. Rather I would say the as represents the reservation of their kingly rights in their alliance with the beast) one hour (i. e. during the space of one hour: just as the corresponding term in ch. viii. 1 means, during the space of half an hour. Some, e. g. Vitranga and Elliott, have upheld the meaning of "at one and the same time with." But I venture to say that but for a preconceived opinion, no one would ever have thought of any other meaning for these words than the ordinary one, "for the space of one hour." And thus accordingly we will take them, as signifying some definite space, unknown to us, thus designated: analogous in position to the term "a short space" above) together with (i. e. in conjunction with, allied with: their power will be associated with his power) the beast (who are these? The answer seems to be furnished us in Dan. vii. 23 ff. They are ten kingdoms which shall arise out of the fourth great kingdom there: ten European powers, which in the last time, in concert with and subjection to the antichristian power, shall make war against Christ. In the precise number and form here indicated they have not yet arisen. It would not be difficult to point out the elements and already consolidating shapes of most of them: but in precise number we have them not as yet. What changes in Europe may bring them into the required tale and form, it is not for us to say). These have (the present is used in describing them, though they have not yet arisen) one mind (one and the same view and intent and consent), and give their might and power to the beast (becoming his allies and moving at his beck). These shall war with the Lamb (in concert with the beast, ch. xix. 19), and the Lamb shall conquer them, because He is Lord of lords and King of kings, and they who are with Him (shall conquer them also: the verb is implied above) called and chosen (all the called are not chosen, Matt. [xx. 16], xxii. 14: but all that are chosen are first called, 2 Pet. i. 10) and faithful (this way of taking this clause is far better than with Bengel and the A. V., to make the last words into predicate, "and they that are with him are called and chosen and faithful." For 1) it can clearly be no co-ordinate reason with the other assigned for the Lamb's victory, that His followers are, &c., and 2) the arrangement of the sentence in the original [see my Greek Test.] seems against this view).

There is also doubtless an impious parody intended in the position of the harlot to that of Him who sitteth above the water-flood, and remaineth King for ever, Ps. xxix. 10). And the ten horns which thou sawest, and the beast (viz. in that compact and alliance just now mentioned), these shall hate the harlot (we now enter upon prophetic particulars other than those revealed in the vision, where the harlot was sitting on the beast. Previous to these things coming to pass, she must be cast down from her proud position), and shall make her deserted and naked (contrast to ver. 4. Her former lovers shall no longer frequent her nor answer to her call: her rich adornments shall be stripped off. She shall lose, at the hands of those whom she formerly seduced with her cup of fornication, both her spiritual power over them, and her temporal power to adorn herself), and shall eat her flesh (batten upon her spoils;

confiscate her possessions: or perhaps, as the same expression, Ps. xxvii. 2; Micah iii. 2 ff., where it is used to indicate the extreme vengeance of keen hostility), and shall consume her with (in) fire (Düsterdieck remarks that in the former clause the figure of a woman is kept: in this latter the thing signified, a city. But this need not absolutely be: the woman may be here also intended: and all the more probably, because the very words shall consume her with fire are quoted from the legal formula of the condemnation of those who had committed abominable fornications: see Levit. xx. 14, xxi. 9. The burning of the city would be a signal fulfilment: but we cannot positively say that that, and nothing else is intended). For God put it (anticipatory past tense) into their hearts to do His mind, and to make one mind, and to give their kingdom (i. e., as above, the authority of their respective kingdoms) unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled (the prophetic words or discourses, respecting the destruction of Babylon). And the woman whom thou sawest, is the great city, which hath kingdom over the kings of the earth (every thing here is plain. The "city on seven hills which rules the world," can be but one, and that one ROME. The present tense, which hath, points to the time when the words were uttered, and to the dominion then subsisting. It has already been seen, that the prophecy regards Rome pagan and papal, but, from the figure of an harlot and the very nature of the predictions themselves, more the latter than the former. I may observe in passing, that the view maintained recently by Düsterdieck, after many others, that the whole of these prophecies regard pagan Rome only, receives no countenance from the words of this verse, which this school of Commentators are fond of appealing to as decisive for them. Rather may we say that this verse, taken in connexion with what has gone before, stultifies their view entirely. If the woman, as these Commentators insist, represents merely the stone-walls and houses of the city, what need is there for mystery on her brow,—what appropriateness in the use of all the Scripture imagery, long familiar to God's people, of spiritual fornication? And if this were so, where is the contest with the Lamb,—where the fulfilment of any the least portion of the prophecy? If we understand it thus, nothing is left us but to say, as indeed some of this school are not afraid to say, that only the Seer's wish dictated his words, and that history has not verified them. So that this view has one merit: it brings us at once face to face with the dilemma of accepting or rejecting the book: and thereby, for us, who accept it as the word of God, becomes impossible. For us, who believe the prophecy is to be fulfilled, what was Rome then, is Rome now. Her fornications and abominations, as well as her power and pride, are matter of history and of present fact: and we look for her destruction to come, as we believe it is rapidly coming, by the means and in the manner here foretold).

last who came down from heaven, ch. x. 1) coming down out of heaven (the Seer is still on the earth) having great power (possibly as Elliott suggests, as the executor of the judgment that he announced. If so, the announcement is still anticipatory, see ver. 21). and the earth was lighted up by (literally, out of, as the source of the brightness) his glory: and he cried in a mighty voice saying, Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become an habitation of demons (see especially the Septuagint version of Isa. xxxiv. 14 ff., where, instead of wild-beasts, as in A. V., we have demons), and an hold (a place of detention: as it were an appointed prison) of every unclean spirit, and an hold of every unclean and hated bird (see the prophecy respecting Babylon, Jer. i. 39): because of the wrath of her fornication all the nations have drunk (see on ch. xiv. 8. The use of the word wrath is even more remarkable here: of that wine of her fornication which has turned into wrath to herself), and the kings of the earth committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth became rich out of the quantity of her luxury (the word used here,—see note on 1 Tim. v. 11, seems properly to mean the exuberance of strength, the flower of pride).

And I heard another voice out of heaven (not that of the Father, nor of Christ, for in such a case, as has been well observed, the long poetical lamentation would be hardly according to prophetic decorum; but that of an angel speaking in the name of God, as we have my used in ch. xi. 3 also) saying, Come out of her, my people (in the prophetic references in Isaiah, the circumstances differed, in that being a joyful exodus, this a cautionary one: and thus the warning is brought nearer to that one which our Lord commands in Matt. xxiv. 16, and the cognate warnings in the Old Test., viz. that of Lot to come out of Sodom, Gen. xix. 15—22, when her destruction impended, and that of the people of Israel to get them up from the tents of Dathan and Abiram, Num. xvi. 23—26. In Jeremiah, we have the same circumstance of Babylon's impending destruction combined with the warning: and from those places probably, especially Jeremiah li. 45, the words here are taken. The inference has been justly made from them [Elliott iv. p. 40], that there shall be, even to the last, saints of God in the midst of Rome: and that there will be danger of their being, through a lingering fondness for her, partakers in her coming judgments), that ye partake not in her sins,*

9—20.] The mourning over her: and first, 9, 10, by the kings of the earth. And there shall weep and mourn over her the kings of the earth, who committed fornication and luxuriated (see above, ver. 7) with her, when they see the smoke of her burning (see ch. i. 15), standing afar off on account of their fear of her torment (this feature in the prophecy is an objection to the literal understanding of its details. It can hardly be imagined that the kings should bodily stand and look as described, seeing that no combination of events contemplated in the prophecy has brought them together as yet), saying, Woe, woe, the great city, Babylon the strong city, because in one hour has come thy judgment. 11—16.] Lamentation of the merchants. And the merchants of the earth weep and lament (the construction passes into the graphic present, but resumes the future again below, ver. 15, in speaking of the same thing) over her, because no one any longer buys their cargo (the description which follows is perhaps drawn, in its poetic and descriptive features, from the relation of Rome to the world which then was, rather than from its relation at the future time depicted in the prophecy. But it must not for a moment be denied, that the character of this lamentation throws a shade of obscurity over the interpretation, otherwise so plain from the explanation given in ch. xvii. 18. The difficulty is however not confined to the application of the prophecy to Rome papal, but extends over the application of it to Rome at all, which last is determined for us by the solution given ch. xvi. 18. For Rome never has been, and from its very position never could be, a great commercial city. I leave this difficulty unsolved, merely requesting the student to bear in mind its true limits and not to charge it exclusively on that interpretation which only shares it with any other possible one. The main features of the description are taken from that of the destruction of and lamentation over Tyre in Ezek. xxvii., to which city they were strictly applicable. And possibly it may be said that they are also applicable to the church which has wedded herself to the pride of the earth and its luxuries. But certainly, as has been observed, the details of this mercantile lamentation far more nearly suit London, than Rome at any assignable period of her history), a cargo of gold, and of silver, and of precious stone, and of pearls, and of fine linen manufacture, and of purple, and of silken

It was used for costly doors, with fittings of ivory, and for tables. It had a sweet smell), and every article of ivory, and every article of most costly wood, and of brass, and of iron, and of marble; and cinnamon (it is not certain, whether the cinnamomum of the ancients was the same as our cinnamon. Various accounts are given of its origin, but Herodotus, who ascribes it to the country where Dionysus [Bacchus] was born, i. e. to India, seems to give the right statement, if at least it is the modern cinnamon, which comes from Ceylon. In Exod. xiii. 23, it is an ingredient in the holy oil for anointing: in Prov. vii. 17 it is one of the perfumes of the bed of the adulteress: in Cant. iv. 14 it is one of the plants growing in the garden of the beloved), and amomum (a precious ointment made from an Asiatic shrub, and used for the hair), and odours (for incense), and ointment, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine meal (semidalis, the simila or similago of the Latins, the finest wheaten meal: the name has been revived in our time as semolina), and wheat, and cattle and sheep, and of horses and of chariots, and of bodies (i. e. slaves),—and persons (lit. souls) of men (so the A. V. for the corresponding Hebrew expression, Ezek. xxvii. 13, which the Septuagint render as here, souls of men. It seems vain to attempt to draw a distinction between the bodies before mentioned and these souls or persons of men. If any is to be sought, the most obvious is that pointed out by Bengel, and adopted by Ewald, Hengstenberg, and Döderdieck, that bodies expresses such slaves as belong to the horses and chariots, and persons of men slaves in general).

14.] This verse takes the form of a direct address, and then in the next the merchants are taken up again. From this some have thought that it is not in its right place: e. g. Beza and Vitringa fancied it should be inserted after ver. 23: others, as Ewald, that it was originally a marginal addition by the Writer. But irregular as is the insertion, it need not occasion any real difficulty. It takes up the “weep and mourn” of ver. 11, as if “them” after those verbs had been “us,” which is not unnatural in a rhapsodical passage. And “these things,” ver. 15, refers very naturally back to the “fat things and splendid things” mentioned in this verse. And thy harvest of the desire of thy soul (i. e. the ingathering of the dainties and luxuries which thy soul lusted after) has departed from thee, and all [thy] fat things and [thy] splendid things have perished from thee, and they (men) shall never more at all find them.

The next two verses describe, in strict analogy with vv. 9, 10, the attitude and the lamentation of these merchants. The retributive justice shewn in the pouring out of the third vial.

After these things I heard as it were a great voice of much multitude in heaven, of people saying Hallelujah (the word so often found in the Psalter, 'Praise ye Jah,' i. e. Jehovah. Perhaps it is hardly justifiable to lay, as Elliott has done, a stress on this Hebrew formula of praise being now first used, and to infer thence that the Jews are indicated as bearing a prominent part in the following song. The formula must have passed, with the Psalter, into the Christian Church, being continually found in the Septuagint: and its use first here may be quite accounted for by the greatness and finality of this triumph. The form Alleluia, adopted by the Greeks and Latins from inability to express the Hebrew spelling, ought not to be retained in English, as it disguises the sacred name, and thus obliterates the meaning of the word), the salvation and the glory and the might belong to our God: because true and just are His judgments: because He judged (the past tenses are anticipatory. In this case they can be rendered by the simple past in English) the great harlot, which corrupted (whose habit it was to corrupt) the earth in (of the element of the corruption) her fornication; and He exacted in vengeance the blood of His servants from her hand (so almost verbatim in 2 Kings ix. 7, of the vengeance to be taken on Jezebel. The vengeance is considered as a penalty exacted, forced, out of the reluctant hand: see also Gen. ix. 5; Ezek. xxxiii. 6). And a second time they said Hallelujah; and her smoke (of her burning, ch. xviii. 9) goeth up to the ages of the ages (this addition gives a reason for the praise, parallel with those introduced by because before). And the twenty-four elders and the four living-beings fell down and worshipped God who sitteth upon the throne, saying Amen; Hallelujah (thereby confirming the general song of praise of the great multitude). And a voice came forth from the throne (from perhaps gives more the direction than the actual source of the voice. It is useless to conjecture whose voice it is; but we may say that [on account of the expression our God] it is not that of the Lamb. Our Lord never spoke thus: compare John xx. 17, note) saying, Give praise to our God, all His

And I heard as it were the voice of much multitude (see ver. 1), and as it were the voice of many waters, and as it were the voice of strong thunders, saying, Hallelujah, because the Lord God Almighty reigneth. Let us rejoice and exult, and we will give the glory to Him; because the marriage of the Lamb is come (these words introduce to us transitionally a new series of visions respecting the final consummation of the union between Christ and His Church, which brings about the end, ch. xxi. 1 ff.: the solemn opening of which now immediately follows in vv. 11 ff. This series, properly speaking, includes in itself the overthrow of the kings of the earth, the binding of Satan, the thousand years' reign, the loosing of Satan, the final overthrow of the enemy, and the general judgment: but is not consummated except in the entire union of Christ and His with which the book concludes. So that the past tenses are in a measure anticipatory.

This figure, of a marriage between the Lord and His people, is too frequent and familiar to need explanation. Compare in the Old Test. Isa. liv. 1—8; Ezek. xvi. 7 ff.: Hos. ii. 19 f.: and in the New Test., Matt. ix. 15 and note, xxii. 2 ff., xxv. 1 ff.; John iii. 29; Eph. v. 25. Indeed it penetrates almost every where the thoughts and language used respecting Christ and the Church), and His wife hath made herself ready (is complete in her adornment, as in next ver.). And it was given to her (have we in these words still the voice of the celestial chorus, or are they merely narrative, written in the person of the Seer himself? It seems to me that the latter alternative is rendered necessary by the fact of the explanation, "for the fine linen," &c., being subjoined. Moreover the words "to her it was given" are the regular narrative formula of the book) that (a construction of St. John's: so in John xvii. 4, "which Thou gavest me that I should do it;" ch. vi. 4, "given to him that he should take:" viii. 3.) she should be clothed in fine linen raiment, bright and pure (Grotius remarks that this is the grave adornment of a matron, not the ostentatious decking out of a harlot as before described), for the fine linen garment is (imports, see Matt. xxvi. 26) the righteousness of the saints (i.e. their pure and holy state, attained, as in the parallel description ch. vii. 14, is declared by the elder, by their having washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. The plural, righteousnesses, is probably distributive, implying not many to each one, as if they were merely good deeds, but one righteousness to each of the saints, enveloping him as in a pure white robe of righteousness. Observe that here and every where, the white robe is not Christ's righteousness imputed or put on, but the saints' righteousness, by virtue of being washed in His blood. It is their own; inherent, not imputed; but their own by their part in and union to Him).

Our ch. iii. 20 furnishes us with a link binding on the spiritual import to the figure) *to the supper of the marriage of the Lamb. If we understand that the speaker is the angel of ch. xvii. 1, then these sayings will most naturally include the prophecies and revelations since then) are the true [sayings] of God (are the very truth of God, and shall veritably come to pass). And I fell down before his feet to worship him (out of an overweening reverence for one who had imparted to him such great things: see also ch. xxii. 8, where the same again takes place at the end of the whole revelation, and after a similar assurance. The angel who had thus guaranteed to him, in the name of God, the certainty of these great revelations, seems to him worthy of some of that reverence which belongs to God Himself. The reason given by Düsterdieck, that in both cases John imagined the Lord Himself to be speaking to him, is sufficiently contradicted by the plain assertion, here in ch. xvii. 1, and there in ch. xxii. 8 itself, that it was not a divine Person, but simply an angel): and he saith to me, Take heed not (to do it): I am a fellow-servant of thine, and [a fellow-servant] of thy brethren who have the testimony of Jesus (as in ch. i. 2, xii. 17: on the former of which see note): worship God (the stress is on both words: let worship be reserved for Him), for (these words following are those of the angel, not of the Apostle, as Düsterdieck: ver. 8, and ch. v. 8, where the Apostle gives explanations, are no rule for this place, where the explanation of necessity comes from the speaker, whose reason for prohibiting the offered homage it renders) the testimony of Jesus (the genitive of Jesus is, as before, objective: the testimony borne to Jesus by these fellow-servants, men and angels) is the spirit of prophecy (there is no real difficulty in this saying: no reason for destroying its force by making "of Jesus" subjective, and "the testimony of Jesus" to mean "the witness which proceeds from Jesus." What the angel says is this: Thou and I and our brethren are all "those who have the testimony of Jesus," i. e. are witnesses to Jesus; and the way in which we bear this witness, the substance and essence of this testimony, is the spirit of prophecy; "we have all been made to drink into one Spirit." This Spirit, given to me in that I shew thee these things, given to thee in that thou seest and art to write them, is the token that we are fellow-servants and brethren. 11—XXII. 5.] THE END: beginning with the triumphal coming forth of the Lord and His saints to victory (vv. 11—16), then proceeding with the great defeat and destruction of the beast and false prophet and kings of the earth (vv. 17—21), the binding of Satan and the millennial reign (ch. xx. 1—6), the unbinding of Satan and his destruction and that of the deceived nations (xx. 7—10), the great general judgment (xx. 11—15), and terminating with the vision of the new heavens and earth, and the glories of the new Jerusalem (xxi. 1—xxii. 5).

11—16.] The triumphal coming forth of the Lord and His hosts to victory. And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse (the same words, including the five following, as in ch. vi. 2. It is wonderful that this striking identity, in a book where symbolism is so constant to itself, has not prevented the mistakes which have been made in interpreting that place. This horse and Rider are the same as there: the “conquering and to conquer” is on the point of its completion: the other horses and their riders, dark forms in His great world-long procession to victory, will now for ever vanish, and war and famine and pestilence be known no more), and He that sitteth upon him [called] faithful and true (see ch. iii. 14), and in righteousness He judgeth and warreth (both those acts being his concern in his present triumphant progress). His eyes [were as] a flame of fire (ch. i. 14 verbatim, again beyond question identifying Him), and upon His head many diadems (probably as He is King of Kings. Certainly these are not the crowns of the ten kings, as some say, for they are yet to be overthrown, ver. 19 ff. The crown of ch. vi. 2 has become multiplied in the course of the subjection of the world to Him): having [names written (if these words are genuine, probably the meaning is that the names were inscribed on the diadems, signifying the import of each), and] a name written (where, is not said. From this portion of the description regarding His Head, probably on the Brow) which none knoweth except Himself (what name is indicated? Certainly not that given below, ver. 13; nor can these words mean that He Himself alone knows the mystery latent in that name. Nor again can we say that it is any of the names by which our blessed Lord is known to us already. But it is “my new name” of ch. iii. 12: some new and glorious name, indicative, as appears from the context there, of the completed union between Him and His people, and of His final triumph. This name the Apostle saw written, but knew not its import: that, like the contents of the sealed book, being reserved for the day when He shall reveal it): and clothed in a vesture dipped in blood (see Isa. lxiii. 2, 3: which is clearly in contemplation here, from our ver. 15 b. This being so, it is better perhaps to avoid the idea of His own blood being in view): and His name is called, The Word of God (this title forms so plain a link between the Apocalypse and St. John’s writings, where only it occurs, that various attempts have been made by those who reject his authorship, to deprive it of that significance. And the armies which are in heaven (not the holy angels only, but the glorified saints: "they that are with Him" of ch. xvii. 14, who are spoken of in reference to this very triumph, and are said to be "called and chosen and faithful") followed Him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen [raiment], white, pure (this clothing also speaks for the saints being included in the triumphal procession: see ver. 8, and ch. vi. 11). And out of His mouth goeth forth a sharp sword (see ch. i. 16, ii. 12, 16), that with (as invested in or with) it He may smite the nations; and He (there is an emphasis in this and the following clause on the word He, which however would be too strongly rendered by "himself") shall rule (see ch. ii. 27, xii. 5, and note) them (their component members) with a rod of iron: and He (and none other, as we know from Isa. lxiii. 3) treadeth (it is His office to tread) the winepress of the wine of the fierceness of the wrath (of the outbreathing of the anger: see on ch. xvi. 19) of Almighty God. And He hath upon His vesture and upon His thigh a name written (i.e. most naturally, written at length, partly on the vesture, partly on the thigh itself; at the part where, in an equestrian figure, the robe drops from the thigh. The usual way of taking the words is to suppose the and explanatory or definitive of the former words, "on His vesture," and that on the part of it covering His thigh. Others imagine a sword, on the hilt of which the name is inscribed. But there is no trace of this in the text. Cicero describes "a beautiful figure of Apollo, on whose thigh was inscribed in small silver letters the name of the artist, Myro:" and Pausanias speaks of the dedicatory inscription of a statue being engraved on its thigh), King of Kings, and Lord of Lords (ch. xvii. 14).

flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains of thousands, and the flesh of strong men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all, free as well as bond, both small and great (this proclamation is evidently not to be pressed into a place in the prophecy, nor are its details to be sought in the interpretation, as has been done by Andreas and Primasius, who held the birds to be angels, and Brightmann, who holds them to be nations and churches. The insertion is made, as above, to shew the greatness and universality of the coming slaughter). And I saw the wild-beast (ch. xiii. 1), and the kings of the earth and their armies gathered together (as above under the sixth vial, ch. xvi. 12 ff., on the field of Har-magedon) to make their war (viz. that predicted above, ch. xvi. 14, xvii. 14) with Him that sitteth upon the horse and with his army (singular, probably as being one, and having one head, whereas they are many, and under various leaders). And the beast was taken, and those with him (to wit, the false prophet, and the rest, ver. 21),—the false prophet who wrought the miracles in his presence (compare ch. xiii. 11—17, by which it clearly appears that this false prophet is identical with that second beast), with which he deceived those who received (not necessarily nor probably, who had received, as A. V.) the mark of the beast and those who worshipped his image (compare ch. xiii. 14, 16): the two were cast alive into the lake of fire which burneth with brimstone (viz. into Gehenna, or hell properly so called, Matt. v. 22; Luke vi. 23; where also, after the millennium, Satan himself is cast, ch. xx. 10, and, when their work is finally accomplished, Death and Hadés, ib. 14 a. This lake of fire constitutes the second death, ib. 14 b, xxi. 8. These only, and not the Lord's human enemies yet, are cast into eternal punishment. The latter await the final judgment, ch. xx. 11 ff.). And the rest (the kings and their armies) were slain with the sword of Him that sitteth on the horse, which (sword) goeth forth out of His mouth (see Isa. xi. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 8. De Wette remarks, that it is a hint of the spiritual nature of this victory, that no battle seems actually to take place, but the Lord Himself, as in 2 Thess., destroys the adversaries with the sword out of His own mouth. But clearly all must not be thus spiritualized. For if so, what is this gathering? what is indicated by the coming forth of the Lord in glory and majesty? Why is His personal presence wanted for the victory?); and all the birds were satiated with their flesh.

CH. XX. 1—10.] THE VICTORY OVER SATAN. The next enemy now remaining is the Arch-fiend himself, who had given his might and his throne and great power (ch. xiii. 2) to the beast: whose instruments the other enemies were. The blow given to him by their overthrow is followed by his binding and incarceration for 1000 years (vv. 1—3): during which period the Saints live and reign with Christ, and judge the world, and the first resurrection takes place (vv. 4—6). But his malice and his power are not yet at an end. One final effort is permitted him at the end of that time (ver. 7), and he once more succeeds in deceiving the nations (ver. 8), who come up against the camp of the saints, and are destroyed by fire from heaven (ver. 9). He is then cast into the lake of fire with the beast and false prophet, there to be tormented for ever (ver. 10).

And I saw an angel coming down out of heaven (not Christ himself, as many suppose, nor the Holy Spirit, as others: but a veritable angel, as always before in this book) having the key of the abyss (of hell, the abode of the devil and his angels: see ch. ix. 1. For this abyss apparently is distinct from the lake of fire, a further and more dreadful place of punishment: see on ver. 10. This key had been for the purposes of God's judgments given to Satan (Abaddon, Apollyon), and by him the locusts were let forth, ch. ix. 1—11. Now it is entrusted to other hands, and for another purpose), and a great chain in (so in English: in the Greek, resting on, hanging upon, as a chain naturally would be) his hand. And he laid hold of the dragon (already well known from ch. xii. 3 ff., 9; xiii. 2, 4; xvi. 13), the ancient serpent (see ch. xii. 9), who is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the abyss, and shut and sealed over him (shut the door or cover at the top, and sealed it down. Notice, that the same absolute use of the verb "to seal" in the active is found in John iii. 33, and apparently there only), that he deceive the nations no more, until the thousand years shall be accomplished: after that he must (according to the necessity of God's purposes) be loosed for a little time (see below, ver. 7).

That is, they were constituted judges). And I saw the souls of them who had been beheaded (literally, smitten with the axe) on account of the testimony of Jesus and on account of the word of God (see ch. i. 9), and (of those) the which did not worship (during life) the beast nor yet his image, and did not receive the mark (mentioned ch. xiii. 16) on their forehead and upon their hand: and they lived (i.e. "lived again;" and, as the act is presently described as the first resurrection, with their bodies, perfect and complete) and reigned with Christ (took part in His Kingdom: see ch. i. 6; 2 Tim. ii. 12: also 1 Cor. iv. 8 and note) a thousand years (it would certainly appear that this reigning includes the office of judgment. Many interpreters suppose that these saints are the judged: but there is nothing in the context, nor in other parts of Scripture, to favour this idea. Nay, it is expressly negated by our Lord's saying in John v. 24: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, That he who heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath eternal life, and cometh not into judgment, but hath passed from death unto life"). The rest of the dead lived not (again, as above) until the thousand years be completed, This is the first resurrection (remarks on the interpretation of this passage will be found in the Introduction, § v. par. 33. It will have been long ago anticipated by the readers of this Commentary, that I cannot consent to distort its words from their plain sense and chronological place in the prophecy, on account of any considerations of difficulty, or any risk of abuses which the doctrine of the millennium may bring with it. Those who lived next to the Apostles, and the whole Church for 300 years, understood them in the plain literal sense: and it is a strange sight in these days to see expositors who are among the first in reverence of antiquity, complacently casting aside the most cogent instance of unanimity which primitive antiquity presents. As regards the text itself, no legitimate treatment of it will extort what is known as the spiritual interpretation now in fashion. If, in a passage where two resurrections are mentioned, where certain souls lived at the first, and the rest of the dead lived only at the end of a specified period after that first,—if in such a passage the first resurrection may be understood to mean spiritual rising with Christ, while the second means literal

If the first resurrection is spiritual, then so is the second, which I suppose none will be hardy enough to maintain: but if the second is literal, then so is the first, which in common with the whole primitive Church and many of the best modern expositors, I do maintain, and receive as an article of faith and hope). Blessed (see ch. xiv. 13, xix. 9) and holy is he that hath part in (the expression is peculiar to St. John) the first resurrection: over such persons the second death (ch. ii. 11, xxi. 8: and bear in mind what is said of our Lord Himself, Rom. vi. 9) hath not power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and they [shall] reign with Him (Christ) a (or, the) thousand years.

the beloved city (by these two is probably meant one and the same thing, the and being explanatory; or at all events the camp must be conceived as surrounding and defending the city. The beloved city is Jerusalem [see Ps. lxxviii. 68; lxxvii. 2]: not the new Jerusalem, but the earthly city of that name, which is destined to play so glorious a part in the latter days). And there came down fire out of heaven) (so in Ezek. in refl.), and devoured them: and the devil that deceiveth them (the present participle merely designates: the devil their deceiver) was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where also are the beast and the false prophet (ch. xix. 20). 11—15.] The general judgment. And I saw a great white throne (great, in distinction from the thrones before mentioned, ver. 4: white, as seen in purest light, and symbolizing the most blameless justice), and Him that sitteth on it (viz. God: the Father: see ch. iv. 3, xxi. 5. It is necessary to keep to the well-known formula of the book in interpreting Him that sitteth on it, even though some expressions and sayings seem better to belong to the Son. Be it also remembered that it is the Father who giveth all judgment to the Son: and though He Himself judgeth no man, yet He is ever described as present in the judgment, and mankind as judged before Him. We need not find in this view any difficulty, or discrepancy with such passages as Matt. xxv. 31, seeing that our Lord himself says in ch. iii. 21, "I . . . sat down with my Father on His throne." Nor need we be surprised at the sayings of our Lord, such as that in ch. xxi. 6 b, being uttered by him that sitteth on the throne. That throne is now the throne of God and of the Lamb, ch. xxii. 1. Compare also ch. xxi. 22), from whose face the earth and the heaven fled, and place was not found for them (these words again seem to indicate the presence of One who has not hitherto appeared: whereas Christ in glory has been long present on earth. This fleeing away of heaven and earth is elsewhere described as their consumption by fire, 2 Pet. iii. 10—12. Both descriptions indicate the passing away of their present corruptible state and change to a state glorious and incorruptible). And I saw the dead (viz. the "rest of the dead" of ver. 5: those who rose as described below, ver. 13), the great and the small, standing before the throne, and books were opened (see Dan. vii. 10), and another book was opened which is [the book] of life (Düsterdieck remarks that the order of proceedings indicated seems to be that the contents of the books in which were written the works of men indicated whether they were to be found in the book of life. But this could hardly be: for in that case, what need for the book of life at all? Rather should we say that those books and the book of life bore independent witness to the fact of men being or not being among the saved: the one by inference from the works recorded: the other by inscription or non-inscription of the name in the list. So the 'books' would be as it were the vouchers for the book of life): and the dead were judged out of the things written in the books according to their works (rell.: and 2 Cor. v. 10). And the sea gave forth the dead that were in her, and Death and Hades (see ch. i. 18, vi. 8) gave forth the dead which were in them (i. e. all the dead, buried and unburied, rose again), and they were judged each according to their (his) works. And Death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire (Death and Hades are regarded as two demons, enemies of God. So in 1 Cor. xv. 26, "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death:" and in Isa. xxv. 8: Heb. and A. V., "He will swallow up death in victory," compare 1 Cor. xv. 54. Hades, as in ch. vi. 8, is Death's follower and the receiver of his prey. The punishment of sin is inflicted on both, because both are the offspring of, and bound up with sin). This is the second death, the lake of fire (thus then our Lord's saying, ch. ii. 11, and that of the Apostle in our ver. 6, are explained. As there is a second and higher life, so there is also a second and deeper death. And as after that life there is no more death [ch. xxi. 4], so after that death there is no more life, ver. 10; Matt. xxv. 41). And if any was not found written in the book of life, he was cast into the lake of fire (there was no intermediate state).

lxv. 17. The vision does not necessarily suppose the annihilation of the whole creation, but only its passing away as to its outward and recognizable form, and renewal to a fresh and more glorious one. And though not here stated on the surface, it is evident that the method of renewal is that described in 2 Pet. iii. 10 ff.; viz. a renovation by fire. This alone will account for the unexpected and interesting feature here introduced, viz. that the sea exists no longer. For this the words mean [see ver. 4], and not as Düsterdieck, that the [former] sea, as well as the former heaven and earth, had passed away). And I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem (see especially Gal. iv. 26, and note), coming down out of heaven from God (Schöttgen quotes from the remarkable Jewish book Sohar, "Rabbi Jeremiah said, The Holy Blessed God shall renew the world, and shall build Jerusalem, so as to make it come down from heaven into the midst of the world, so that it even shall be destroyed"), prepared as a bride adorned for her husband (as in our common discourse, so here with the Evangelist, the name of the material city stands for the community formed by its inhabitants. But it does not follow in his case, any more than in ours, that both material city and inhabitants have not a veritable existence: nor can we say that the glorious description of it, presently to follow, applies only to them. On the figure, see Isa. lxi. 10—lxii. 5). And I heard a great voice out of the throne saying, Behold, the tabernacle (i. e. dwelling; the allusion being to the tabernacle in the wilderness, in which God dwelt in symbol only) of God is with men, and He shall dwell (tabernacle) with them, and they shall be his people (literally, peoples, plural: because, as in ch. xxi. 24, many nations shall now partake in the blessed fulfilment of the promise), and He shall be God with them (the name Emmanuel, God with us, first then being realized in its full significance), their God (so the ancient promises are fulfilled, Exod. xxix. 45; Lev. xxvi. 11; Ezek. xxxvii. 27). And [God] shall wipe away every tear from their eyes (reff.); and death shall exist no longer (ch. xx. 14), and (Gr. nor) mourning (Isa. lxv. 19) and (nor) crying and (nor) pain shall exist no longer: because the first (former state of) things are passed away. And He that sitteth on the throne (see note ch. xx. 11) said, Behold, I make all things new. And he (probably the angel, or voice from heaven, that gave the Seer similar commands before, xiv. 13, xix. 9. The city must not be conceived of as on or covering the mountain, but as seen descending to a spot close by it: so in Ezek. xl. 2, whether we read “by” or “upon” as in our margin), having the glory of God (i.e. not merely brightness of a divine and celestial kind, but the glorious presence of God Himself, the Shechinah, abiding in her: see ver. 23: also ch. xv. 8): her brightness (the brightness, from ver. 23, is the effect of the divine glory shining in her) [was] like to a stone: most precious, as it were to a jasper stone, crystal-clear (see this “crystallizing” jasper discussed in note on ch. iv. 3.

Ebrard thinks it is the diamond): having a wall great and high, having [also] twelve gates (see Ezek. xlviii. 30 ff., where the same features are found in the description), and at the gates twelve angels and names inscribed (contrast to the names of blasphemy, ch. xvii. 3), which are the names of the twelve tribes of the sons of Israel (it does not follow from this description either, 1. that the angels must necessarily be guardians, seeing that no foes remain to be guarded against: they are for the completeness and adornment of the city after the idea of a beautiful fortress, adopted to set it forth:—or, 2. that, as in the Jewish books, each gate is to be imagined as used by each tribe: the twelve tribes of Israel represent the whole people of God, and the city the encampment of Israel: see below). From (on the side entering from) the sun-rising three gates (Joseph, Benjamin, Dan, in Ezek. xlviii. 32. nasseh, Benjamin: North,—Dan, Asher, Naphtali). And the wall of the city (the wall surrounding the city) having (had) twelve foundation-stones (i. e. probably, each portion of the wall joining two gates had a conspicuous basement, of one vast stone. Four of these, as Dürstler observes, would be corner-stones, joining the third gate on one side to the first gate on the next), and upon them (over them, perhaps extending all their length) twelve names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb (see Eph. ii. 20, where however the ruling idea is a different one, see the interpretation in the note. No inference can be drawn, as has been drawn by some from this, that the Writer was not himself an Apostle). <sup>15—17.</sup> Its measurement: compare Ezek. xl. 3—5. And he that spoke with me had as a measure a golden reed, that he might measure the city, and her gates and her wall. And the city lieth foursquare (so A. V. well: is in shape tetragonal), and her length is as great as her breadth (see below). And he measured the city with the reed to the length of stadii of the amount of twelve thousands (the 12,000 stadii are in all probability the whole circumference, 1000 to each space between the gates); the length and the breadth and the height of it are equal (the supposition of many expositors, that the city thus formed a monstrous cube, 3000 stadii in length, in breadth, and in height, really does not appear to be necessarily included in these words. Nay, it seems to be precluded by what next follows, where the angel measures the height of the wall. For Dürstler's idea that the houses were 3000 stadii in height, while the wall was only 144 cubits, is too absurd to come at all into question. The words are open, this last consideration being taken into account, to two interpretations: 1) that the city, including the hill or rock on which it was placed, and which may be imagined as descending with it, formed such a cube as seems here described: or 2) that there is some looseness of use in the word equal, and that we must understand that the length and breadth were equal to each other and the height equal all round. Of these two I prefer the former, as doing no violence to the words, and as recalling somewhat the form of the earthly Jerusalem on its escarpment above the valley of the Kedron. Some such idea seems also to be pointed at in the rabbinical books, which describe the future Jerusalem as twelve miles high. See extracts in my Greek Test.). And he measured the wall of it (i. e. the height of the wall of it), of an hundred and forty-four cubits, the measure of a man, which is that of an angel (meaning that in this matter of

The foundation-stones of the wall of the city (see above, ver. 14) [were] adorned with every precious stone (not that the stones were merely set on the foundations, but that the foundations themselves consisted of them: see below, and compare Isa. liv. 12): the first foundation-stone [was] jasper (the material of the upper building of the wall, ver. 18), the second, sapphire (the stone described under this name by Pliny seems to be our lapis lazuli. But the sapphire of the Scriptures seems more like the present hard sky-blue stone known by that name: see Ezek. i. 26), the third, chalcedony (this name is unknown: corresponding perhaps to Exod. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12, "agate." There seems to have been an agate brought from Chalcedon. It is described as semi-opaque, sky-blue, with stripes of other colours: "like trees in autumn," Pliny), the fourth, emerald (note, ch. iv. 3), the fifth, sar-donyx (Exod. xxxix. 11; Ezek. xxviii. 13; perhaps garnet. Pliny describes it as "of the colour of the flesh under a fingernail." The ancient versions and Josephus call it onyx), the sixth, sardius (ch. iv. 3, note), the seventh, chrysolith (Ezek. xxviii. 13, where Josephus thus renders the word which in A. V. is "beryl." The stone at present so called is pale green, transparent, and crystallized, with shifting colours. But the ancient chrysoliths are described by Pliny as translucent with golden rays, and have been supposed the same as our topaz: or by some, as amber), the eighth, beryl (Exod. xxiv. 10, where it is "sapphire" in the A. V. It is said to have been pure sea-green), the ninth, topaz (Strabo describes it as transparent, shining with golden light. But Pliny says that it is a beautiful green: whence some have supposed it our chrysolith: see above. Compare Job xxviii. 19), the tenth, chrysoprasus (this word is found only in Pliny, who describes it as pale, and of a hue resembling the amethyst), the eleventh, jacinth (in Exod. xxviii. 19, called figure. Pliny describes this also as a paler kind of amethyst), the twelfth, amethyst (Pliny reckons the amethyst among the purple stones. It seems to be the stone now known by that name). And the twelve gates, twelve pearls (Isa. liv. 12, "carbuncles." Wetstein quotes from a Rabbinical work, that God shall place in the gates of the new Jerusalem pearls thirty

And the street (generic: the street-material, throughout) of the city [was] pure gold like transparent glass (see above on ver. 18). And a temple I saw not in it: for the Lord God Almighty is the temple of it, and the Lamb (i. e. the inhabitants need no place of worship or sacrifice, the object of all worship being present, and the great Sacrifice Himself being there). And the city hath not need of the sun nor yet of the moon, that they should shine on her: for the glory of God (the brightness of His presence, the Shechinah: see above, ver. 11) lightened her, and her lamp was (or is) the Lamb (see Isa. lx. 19, 20. No assignment of the members of the sentence must be thought of, such as that the glory of God is her Sun, and the Lamb her moon, as has been done by some Commentators): and the nations shall walk by means of her light (i. e. she shall be so bright as to serve the light,— for sun and moon both,—to the world that then is, and her inhabitants. For such inhabitants are clearly supposed; see below, and ch. xxii. 2). And they (men) shall bring the glory and the costliness of the nations into her (Isa. lvi. 12. Among the mysteries of this new heaven and new earth this is set forth to us: that, besides the glorified church, there shall still be dwelling on the renewed earth nations, organized under kings, and [xxii. 2] saved by means of the influences of the heavenly city). nation and falsehood, but only (literally, except) they that are written in the book of life of the Lamb (if then the kings of the earth, and the nations, bring their glory and their treasures into her, and if none shall ever enter into her that is not written in the book of life, it follows, that these kings, and these nations, are written in the book of life. And so perhaps some light may be thrown on one of the darkest mysteries of redemption. There may be,—I say it with all diffidence, — those who have been saved by Christ without ever forming a part of his visible organized Church).

[Ch. XXII. 1—5.] The end of the description: the means of healing for the nations (1, 2): the blessedness, and eternal reign of the glorified servants of God (2—5).

And he shewed me a river of water of life, bright as crystal, coming forth out of the throne of God and of the Lamb (which throne is one and the same: see ch. iii. 21, and note on ch. xx. 11. The Old Test. passages in view are Gen. ii. 10; Ezek. xlvii. 1 ff.). In the midst of the street of it (the city), and of the river, on one side and on the other (the meaning being that the trees were on each side in the middle of the space between the street and the river. See Ezek. xlvii. 7), [was] the tree of life (ch. ii. 7; Ezek. as above, and what follows, i. e. trees of the kind described: as in Ezek.) producing twelve fruits (kinds of fruit, Ezek. xlvii. 12), according to each month yielding its fruit (Ezek. as above): and the leaves of the tree [are] for healing of the nations (so exactly, Ezek. ver. 12: “and the leaf thereof for medicine.” On the nations outside, see above, ch. xxi. end). And every curse (accursed thing, see below) shall exist no longer (compare Zech. xiv. 11. There shall no more be those accursed things which bar the residence of God among His people; see Josh. vii. 12, which shews that these words are in close connexion with what follows): and the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in her, and his servants shall serve Him (in ministration and holy service, see ch. vii. 15), and they shall see His face (be close to Him, and know Him, even as they are known, Matt. v. 8), and His name [shall be] on their foreheads (see ch. vii. 3). And night shall not be any more (ch. xxi. 25), and they shall have no need of [the light of] a lamp or (and) of [the] light [of the sun] (ch. xxi. 23. 6—21.] CONCLUDING ASSURANCES AND EXHORTATIONS : and herein, 6, 7, assurance by the angel of the truth of what has been said, in the terms of ch. i. 1. And he (the angel) said to me, These sayings (the whole book, by what follows) are faithful and true : and the Lord (Jehovah) the God of the spirits of the prophets (i. e. of those spirits of theirs, which, informed by the Holy Spirit, have become the vehicles of prophecy) sent His angel to shew to His servants what things must come to pass shortly (on the whole of this, see on ch. i. 1, from which place it is repeated at the close of the book of which that is the opening). And behold, I come quickly (the speech passes into the words of Christ Himself, reported by the angel : so in ver. 12, and in ch. xi. 3). Blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of this book (the speech is a mixed one : in the words of this book, the Writer has in view the roll of his book now lying all but completed before him : but the words are the saying of the angel : “ of this prophecy,” would express it formally). And I John [am he] who heard and saw these things : and when I heard and saw, I fell down (as in ch. xix. 10, where see notes) to worship before the feet of the angel who shewed me these things. And he saith to me, Take heed not : I am a fellow-servant of thine, and (a fellow-servant) of thy brethren the prophets, and of those who keep the sayings of this book : worship God (the same feeling again prevailed over the Apostle as before, and is met with a similar rebuke). And he saith to me, Seal not up the sayings of the prophecy of this book unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still. <sup>12</sup> And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be. <sup>13</sup> I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last. <sup>14</sup> Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. <sup>15</sup> For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whore-mongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie. <sup>16</sup> I Jesus have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things in the churches. I am the root

(compare ch. x. 4, where the command is otherwise: also Daniel viii. 26): for the time is near (in Dan. viii. 26, the reason for sealing up the vision is that the time shall be for many days). Let him that is unjust commit injustice still: and let the filthy (morally polluted) pollute himself still: and let the righteous do righteousness still, and the holy sanctify himself still (see Ezek. iii. 27: and compare Matt. xxvi. 45, "Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold the hour is at hand:" also Ezek. xx. 39. The saying has solemn irony in it: the time is so short, that there is hardly room for change—the lesson conveyed in its depth is, "Change while there is time"). Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me (Isa. xl. 10) to render to each as his work is (these words sound as if spoken by our Lord himself: perhaps at the conclusion, the Apostle puts together, in prophetic shortness, many divine sayings of warning and consolation, with the replies to them). I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end (these words have hitherto been said by the Father: see above, ch. i. 8, xxi. 6, and notes. And in all probability it is so here likewise, whether we assume the words to be spoken by Christ in God's name, or by the Eternal Father Himself). Blessed are they that wash their robes (see the margin, and ch. vii. 14, where the expression is fuller, "in the blood of the Lamb." The difference in the readings is curious, being in the original that between poiountes tas entolas autou and pluwontes tas stolas autou, either of which might easily be mistaken for the other) that they may have the power (licence) over the tree (to eat of the tree) of life, and may enter by the gates into the city. Outside are the dogs (impure persons, see reff.), and the sorcerers, and the fornicators, and the murderers, and the idolaters, and every one loving and practising falsehood (see on these, ch. xxi. 8).

I Jesus (our Lord now speaks directly in His own person) sent my angel to testify these things to you in the churches. I this book: and if any one shall take away from the sayings of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his portion from the tree of life (strike out his portion from the aggregate of those of which the whole participation of that tree is made up), and out of the holy city, which are written in this book (see Deut. as before. The adding and taking away are in the application and reception in the heart: and so it is not a mere formal threat to the copier of the book. All must be received and realized. This is at least an awful warning both to those who despise and neglect this book, and to those who add to it by irrelevant and trifling interpretations).

20, 21.] FINAL ASSURANCE of the Lord, and REPLY of the Apostle on behalf of the Church: and BENEDICTION. He who testifieth these things (the Lord Jesus) saith, Yea, I come quickly. Amen (the reply of the Apostle, not the conclusion of our Lord's saying), Come, Lord Jesus.

GREEK TESTAMENT:

With English Notes. Intended for the Upper Forms of Schools and for Pass-men at the Universities.

LATE SCHOLAR OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

This volume consists of the revised text printed from the latest editions of the larger work. In cases where two readings seem of equal authority, the alternative text is presented beneath. The notes are faithful abridgments of those in the larger edition, presenting the results there arrived at, and supporting them by short proofs. Especial care has been taken to mark the sequence of thought from chapter to chapter, and in the more closely reasoned portions from verse to verse. Additional grammatical notes will be found, adapted to the use of younger Students, and accompanied by references to the usages of the Septuagint version and the rules of Donaldson's Greek Grammar. Other books referred to for information on proper names, the use of words, &c., are Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, Stanley's Sinai and Palestine (5th edit.), Trench's Synonyms of the N. T.

The whole is prefaced by concise notices of the authorship, object, and date of each book.

THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH: its Divine Ideal, Ministry, and Institutions. A short Treatise. With a Catechism on each Chapter, forming a Course of Methodical Instruction on the subject. By EDWARD MEYRICK GOULBURN, D.D., Dean of Norwich. Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

"Dr. Goulburn has conferred a great boon on the Church of England by the treatise before us, which vindicates her claim as a branch of the Catholic Church on the allegiance of her children, setting forth as he does, with singular precision and power, the grounds of her title-deeds, and the Christian character of her doctrine and discipline."—STANDARD.

"His present book would have been used for an educational book even if he had not invited men to make that use of it by appending a catechism to each particular chapter, and thus founding a course of methodical instruction upon his text. We have not yet come across any better book for giving to Dissenters or to such inquirers as hold fast to Holy Scripture. It is, we need scarcely say, steeped in Scripturalness, and full of bright and suggestive interpretations of particular texts."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

"... Must prove highly useful, not only to young persons, but to the very large class, both Churchmen and Dissenters, who are painfully ignorant of what the Catholic Church really is, and of the peculiar and fixed character of her institutions."—ROCK.

"The catechetical questions and answers at the end of each chapter will be useful both for teachers and learners, and the side notes at the head of the paragraphs are very handy."—CHURCH TIMES.

"It contains a great deal of instructive matter, especially in the catechisms—or, as they might almost be called, dialogues—and is instinct with a spirit at once temperate and uncompromising. It is a good book for all who wish to understand, neither blindly asserting it nor being half-ashamed of it, the position of a loyal member of the English Church."—GUARDIAN.

THE GOSPEL OF THE CHILDHOOD: a Practical and Devotional Commentary on the Single Incident of our Blessed Lord's Childhood (St. Luke ii. 41, to the end): designed as a Help to Meditation on the Holy Scriptures, for Children and Young Persons. By EDWARD MEYRICK GOULBURN, D.D., Dean of Norwich. Square 16mo. 5s.

"The commentaries are many of them very beautiful; while the language is forcible yet so simple as easily to be understood by children."—CHURCH HERALD.

"No parent could wish for a better book to be placed in the hand of his boys, for whom the volume is more particularly intended."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

"The most graphic and truest account of our Lord's Childhood to be found out of the range of uninspired writings."—STANDARD.

"We need hardly say that the teaching is sound and good. But we must add that it is often of exceeding beauty, while the quantity of information which the Dean manages to interweave in the pleasantest way forms a not inconsiderable item in the value of the book."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"It is a most choice book, very much to be commended. The teaching is sober and scriptural, and the rich stores of learning which the Dean possesses have served to adorn, without overloading, the plain record of the Word of God."—CHRISTIAN OBSERVER.

THE FIRST BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER OF EDWARD VI., and the Ordinal of 1549, together with the Order of the Communion, 1548. Reprinted entire, and Edited by the Rev. HENRY BASKERVILLE WALTON, M.A., late Fellow and Tutor of Merton College. With an Introduction by the Rev. PETER GOLDSMITH MEDD, M.A., Rector of Barnes, late Senior Fellow and Tutor of University College, Oxford. Small 8vo. 6s.

"A volume like this is worth two of Church History. In many respects, indeed, it is the subject of history itself; and with Mr. Medd's introduction and Mr. Walton's editorial work we may be said to have both subject and history thereof. The volume should be in the hands of every member of the Church of England; we may say, it should be in those of every student of Church History."—ATHENÆUM.

"We welcome the seasonable appearance of this work, which indeed supplies a long-felt want, for 'the First Book' has been hitherto accessible to very few. . . . It is especially important at the present time that the principles of the first Reformers should be understood; and no one can look through this edition without gaining some definite information on that point. We commend this new edition of the First Prayer Book, with its introduction to the study of all that are desirous of understanding the principles of those who originated the reform of our public Services."—CHURCH NEWS.

"The more that English Churchmen become acquainted with the Reformed Prayer Book, as our English Divines reformed it, apart from the meddling of foreigners—i.e., the better people become acquainted with 'Edward VI.'s first book,' the better both for themselves, and for the English Church at large. We are therefore delighted to welcome this handy and handsome reprint, with which every pains has been taken to make it as accurate as possible."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"Mr. Walton deserves the very best thanks of Anglican Churchmen, for putting this most important volume within their reach in so convenient and handsome a form."—CHURCH REVIEW.

THE SOUL IN ITS PROBATION: Sermons preached at the Church of St. Alban-the-Martyr, Holboin, on the Sundays in Lent, 1873. By the Rev. F. N. OXENHAM, M.A. 8vo. 5s.

SAMARITANS, AND OTHER SERMONS, preached in the Church of S. George-the-Martyr, Middlesex. By the Rev. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 3s.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER; being a Manual of Devotion for the Use of Families and Schools. With a Preface by the Rev. W. E. SCUDAMORE, M.A., Rector of Ditchingham. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

WORDS TO TAKE WITH US. A Manual of Daily and Occasional Prayers, for Private and Common Use. With Plain Instructions and Counsels on Prayer. By W. E. SCUDAMORE, M.A., Rector of Ditchingham, and formerly Fellow of S. John's College, Cambridge. New Edition. Revised. Small 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"'Words to Take with Us,' by W. E. Scudamore, is one of the best manuals of daily and occasional prayers we have seen. At once orthodox and practical, sufficiently personal, and yet not perplexingly minute in its details, it is calculated to be of inestimable value in many a household."—JOHN BULL.

"We are again pleased to see an old friend on the editorial table, in a third edition of Mr. Scudamore's well-known Manual of Prayers. The special proper collects for each day of the week, as well as those for the several seasons of the Christian year, have been most judiciously selected. The compiler moreover, while recognizing the full benefits to be derived from the Book of Common Prayer, has not feared to draw largely from the equally invaluable writings of ancient Catholicity. The preface is a systematic arrangement of instructions in prayer and meditation."—CHURCH REVIEW.

THE STAR OF CHILDHOOD. A First Book of Prayers and Instruction for Children. Compiled by a Priest. Edited by the Rev. T. T. CARTER, M.A., Rector of Clewer, Berks. With Six Illustrations, reduced from Engravings by FRA ANGELICO. Second Edition. Royal 16mo. 2s. 6d.

"All the Instructions, all of the Hymns, and most of the Prayers here are excellent. And when we use the cautionary expression 'most of the,' &c., we do not mean to imply that all the prayers are not excellent in themselves, but only to express a doubt whether in some cases they may not be a little too elaborate for children. Of course it by no means follows that when you use a book you are to use equally every portion of it: what does not suit one may suit a score of others, and this book is clearly compiled on the comprehensive principle. But to give a veracious verdict on the book it is useful to mention this. We need hardly say that it is well worth buying, and of a very high order of merit."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"Messrs. Rivington have sent us a manual of prayers for children, called 'The Star of Childhood,' edited by the Rev. T. T. Carter, a very full collection, including instruction as well as devotion, and a judicious selection of hymns."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"The Rev. T. T. Carter, of Clewer, has put forth a much needed and excellent book of devotions for little children, called 'The Star of Childhood.' We think it fair to tell our readers, that in it they will find that for children who have lost a near relative a short commemorative prayer is provided; but we most earnestly hope that even by those who are not willing to accept this usage, the book will not be rejected, for it is a most valuable one."—MONTHLY PACKET.

"One amongst the books before us deserves especial notice, entitled 'The Star of Childhood,' and edited by the Rev. T. T. Carter: it is eminently adapted for a New Year's Gift. It is a manual of prayer for children, with hymns, litanies, and instructions. Some of the hymns are illustrative of our Lord's life; and these are added reduced copies from engravings of Fra Angelico."—PENNY POST.

"Supposing a child to be capable of using a devotional manual, the book before us is, in its general structure, as good an attempt to meet the want as could have been put forth. In the first place it succeeds, where so many like efforts fail, in the matter of simplicity. The language is quite within the compass of a young child; that is to say, it is such as a young child can be made to understand; for we do not suppose that the book is intended to be put directly into his hands, but through the hands of an instructor."—CHURCH BELLS.

"To the same hand which gave us the 'Treasury of Devotion' we are indebted for this beautiful little manual for children. Beginning with prayers suited to the comprehension of the youngest, it contains devotions, litanies, hymns, and instructions, carefully proportioned to the gradually increasing powers of a child's mind from the earliest years, until confirmation. This little book cannot fail to influence for good the impressible hearts of children, and we hope that ere long it will be in the hands of all those who are blessed with Catholic-minded parents. It is beautifully got up, and is rendered more attractive by the capital engravings of Fra Angelico's pictures of scenes of our Lord's childhood. God-parents could scarcely find a more appropriate gift for their God-children than this, or one that is more likely to lead them to a knowledge of the truth."—CHURCH UNION GAZETTE.

"The Star of Childhood' is a first book of Prayers and instruction for children, compiled by a Priest, and edited by the Rev. T. T. Carter, rector of Clewer. It is a very careful compilation, and the name of its editor is a warrant for its devotional tone."—GUARDIAN.

"A handsomely got up and attractive volume, with several good illustrations from Fra Angelico's most famous paintings."—UNION REVIEW.

LECTURES ON THE REUNION OF THE CHURCHES.

By JOHN J. IGN. VON DÖLLINGER, D.D., D.C.L., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Munich, Provost of the Chapel-Royal, &c. &c. Authorized Translation, with Preface by HENRY NUTCOMBE OXENHAM, M.A., late Scholar of Balliol College, Oxford. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"... Marked by all the author's well-known, varied learning, breadth of view, and outspoken spirit. The momentous question which the Doctor discusses has long occupied the thoughts of some of the most earnest and enlightened divines in all branches of the Christian communion, though wide apart in other points of belief and practice. On the infinite importance of reunion among Christian Churches in their endeavour to evangelize the yet remaining two-thirds of the human race—strangers to any form of Christianity—the author enlarges with power and eloquence; and this topic is one of unusual and lasting interest, though, of course, only one among a host of others equally important and equally well discussed."—STANDARD.

"In the present state of thought respecting the union of the Churches, these Lectures will be welcomed by very many persons of different schools of religious thought. They are not the hasty words of an enthusiast, but the calm, well-considered, and carefully prepared writings of one whose soul is profoundly moved by his great subject. They form a contribution to the literature of this grave question, valuable alike for its breadth of historical survey, its fairness, the due regard paid to existing obstacles, and the practical character of its suggestions."—LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.

THE SAYINGS OF THE GREAT FORTY DAYS, Between the Resurrection and Ascension, regarded as the Outlines of the Kingdom of God. In Five Discourses. With an Examination of Dr. Newman's Theory of Development. By GEORGE MOBERLY, D.C.L., Bishop of Salisbury. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

WARNINGS OF THE HOLY WEEK, &c. Being a Course of Parochial Lectures for the Week before Easter and the Easter Festivals. By the Rev. W. ADAMS, M.A., late Vicar of St. Peter's-in-the-East, Oxford, and Fellow of Merton College. Seventh Edition. Small 8vo. 4s. 6d.

SELF-RENUNCIATION. From the French. With Introduction by the Rev. T. T. CARTER, M.A., Rector of Clewer. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"It is excessively difficult to review or criticise, in detail, a book of this kind, and yet its abounding merits, its practicalness, its searching good sense and thoroughness, and its frequent beauty, too, make us wish to do something more than announce its publication. . . . The style is eminently clear, free from redundancy and prolixity."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"Few save Religious and those brought into immediate contact with them are, in all probability, acquainted with the French treatise of Guillardot, a portion of which is now, for the first time we believe, done into English.

Hence the suitability of such a book as this for those who, in the midst of their families, are endeavouring to advance in the spiritual life. Hundreds of devout souls living in the world have been encouraged and helped by such books as Dr. Neale's 'Sermons preached in a Religious House.' For such the present work will be found appropriate, while for Religious themselves it will be invaluable."—CHURCH TIMES.

SPIRITUAL GUIDANCE. With an Introduction by the Rev. T. T. CARTER, M.A., Rector of Clewer, Berks, and Honorary Canon of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"They are full of plain common sense, which is generally the same thing as the highest wisdom, and if they were read, pondered and acted on, would do incalculable good to both priests and people."—UNION REVIEW.

"As a work intended for general use, it will be found to contain much valuable help, and may be profitably studied by any one who is desiring to make progress in spiritual life.

Much of the contents of this little book will be found more or less applicable to all persons amid the ordinary difficulties and trials of life, and a help to the training of the mind in habits of self-discipline."—CHURCH TIMES.

SERMONS ON SPECIAL OCCASIONS. By DANIEL MOORE, M.A., Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, and Vicar of Holy Trinity, Paddington; Author of Hulsean Lectures on "The Age and the Gospel," "Aids to Prayer," &c. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"Rarely have we met with a better volume of Sermons. . . . Orthodox, affectionate, and earnest, these Sermons exhibit at the same time much research, and are distinguished by an elegance and finish of style often wanting in these days of rapid writing and continual preaching."—JOHN BULL.

"Sermons like those of Mr. Moore are however, still of comparative rarity—sermons in which we meet with doctrine which cannot be gainsaid; with a knowledge of the peculiar circumstances of his hearers, which nothing but accurate observation and long experience can secure, and a peculiar felicity of style which many will envy, but to which it is the lot of few to attain."—CHRISTIAN OBSERVER.

"We have had real pleasure, however, in reading these sermons. Here are most of the elements of a preacher's power and usefulness: skilful arrangement of the subject, admirable clearness of style, earnestness, both of thought and language, and the prime qualification of all, 'in doctrine, uncorruptness.'"—LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"We do not wonder at Mr. Moore's long continued popularity with so many hearers; there is so much painstaking and so much genuine desire to discharge his duty as a preacher visible through all the volume. What we miss is the deeper theology, and the spontaneous flow of teaching as from a spring which cannot help flowing, which some of our preachers happily exhibit. But the Sermons may be recommended, or we would not notice them."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

THE HIDDEN LIFE OF THE SOUL. From the French. By the Author of "A Dominican Artist," "Life of Madame Louise de France," &c. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"The Hidden Life of the Soul," by the author of "A Dominican Artist," is from the writings of Father Grou, a French refugee priest of 1792, who died at Lutworth. It well deserves the character given it of being 'earnest and sober,' and not 'sensational.'—GUARDIAN.

"There is a wonderful charm about these readings—so calm, so true, so thoroughly Christian. We do not know where they would come amiss. As materials for a consecutive series of meditations for the faithful at a series of early celebrations they would be excellent, or for private reading during

Advent or Lent."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"From the French of Jean Nicolas Grou, a pious Priest, whose works teach resignation to the Divine will. He loved, we are told, to inculcate simplicity, freedom from all affectation and unreality, the patience and humility which are too surely grounded in self-knowledge to be surprised at a fall, but withal so allied to confidence in God as to make recovery easy and sure. This is the spirit of the volume which is intended to furnish advice to those who would cultivate a quiet, meek, and childlike spirit."—PUBLIC OPINION.

A DOMINICAN ARTIST; a Sketch of the Life of the Rev. Père Besson, of the Order of St. Dominic. By the Author of "The Life of Madame Louise de France," "S. Francis de Sales," &c. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"The author of the Life of Père Besson writes with a grace and refinement of devotional feeling peculiarly suited to a subject-matter which suffers beyond most others from any coarseness of touch. It would be difficult to find 'the simplicity and purity of a holy life' more exquisitely illustrated than in Father Besson's career, both before and after his joining the Dominican Order under the auspices of Lacordaire. . . . Certainly we have never come across what could more strictly be termed in the truest sense 'the life of a beautiful soul.' The author has done well in presenting to English readers this singularly graceful biography, in which all who can appreciate genuine simplicity and nobleness of Christian character will find much to admire and little or nothing to condemn."—SATURDAY REVIEW.

"It would indeed have been a deplorable omission had so exquisite a biography been by any neglect lost to English readers, and had a character so perfect in its simple and complete devotion been withheld from our admiration. . . . But we have dwelt too long already on this fascinating book, and must now leave it to our readers."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"A beautiful and most interesting sketch of the late Père Besson, an artist who forsook the easel for the altar."—CHURCH TIMES.

"A book which is as pleasant for reading as it is profitable for meditation."—UNION REVIEW.

"Whatever a reader may think of Père Besson's profession as a monk, no one will doubt his goodness; no one can fail to profit who will patiently read his life, as here written by a friend, whose sole defect is in being slightly unctuous."—ATHENEUM.

"The life of the Rev. Père Besson, who gave up an artist's career, to which he was devotedly attached, and a mother whose affection for him is not inaptly likened to that of Monica for St. Augustine, must be read in its entirety to be rightly appreciated. And the whole tenour of the book is too devotional, too full of expressions of the most touching dependence on God, to make criticism possible, even if it was called for, which it is not."—JOHN BULL.

"The story of Père Besson's life is one of much interest, and told with simplicity, candour, and good feeling."—SPECTATOR.

"A beautiful book, describing the most saintly and very individual life of one of the companions of Lacordaire."—MONTHLY PACKET.

"We strongly recommend it to our readers. It is a charming biography, that will delight and edify both old and young."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

THE LIFE OF MADAME LOUISE DE FRANCE, daughter of Louis XV. Known also as the Mother Térèse de St. Augustine. By the Author of "A Dominican Artist." New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"On the 15th of July 1737, Marie Leczinska, the wife of Louis XV., and daughter of the dethroned King of Poland, which Prussia helped to despoil and plunder, gave birth to her eighth female child, Louise Marie, known also as the Mother Térèse de St. Augustine. On the death of the Queen, the princess, who had long felt a vocation for a religious life, obtained the consent of her royal father to withdraw from the world. The Carmelite convent of St. Denis was the chosen place of retreat. Here the novitiate was passed, here the final vows were taken, and here, on the death of the Mère Julie, Madame Louise began and terminated her experiences as prioress. The little volume which records the simple incidents of her pious seclusion is designed to edify those members of the Church of England in whom the spirit of religious self-devotion is reviving."—WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

"The annals of a cloistered life, under ordinary circumstances, would not probably be considered very edifying by the reading public of the present generation. When, however, such a history presents the novel spectacle of a royal princess of modern times voluntarily renouncing her high position and the splendours of a court existence, for the purpose of enduring the asceticism, poverty, and austerities of a severe monastic rule, the case may well be different."—MORNING POST.

HENRI PERREYVE. By A. GRATRY, Prêtre de l'Oratoire, Professeur de Morale Evangélique à la Sorbonne, et Membre de l'Académie Française. Translated, by special permission, by the Author of "A Dominican Artist," "Life of S. Francis de Sales," &c., &c. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"... A most touching and powerful piece of biography, interspersed with profound reflections on personal religion, and on the prospects of Christianity. . . . For priests this book is a treasure. The moral of it is the absolute necessity of 'recollectedness' to the higher, and especially the true priestly life."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"The works of the translator of Henri Perreyve form, for the most part, a series of saintly biographies which have obtained a larger share of popularity than is generally accorded to books of this description. . . . The description of his last days will probably be read with greater interest than any other part of the book; presenting as it does an example of fortitude under suffering, and resignation, when cut off so soon after entering upon a much-coveted and useful career, of rare occurrence in this age of self-assertion. This is, in fact, the essential teaching of the entire volume. . . . The translator of the Abbé Gratry's work has done well in giving English readers an opportunity of profiting by its lessons."—MORNING POST.

"Those who take a pleasure in reading a beautiful account of a beautiful character would do well to procure the Life of 'Henri Perreyve.' . . . We would especially recommend the book for the perusal of English priests, who may learn many a holy lesson from the devoted spirit in which the subject of the memoir gave himself up to the duties of his sacred office, and to the cultivation of the graces with which he was endowed."—CHURCH TIMES.

"It is easy to see that Henri Perreyve, Professor of Moral Theology at the Sorbonne, was a Roman Catholic priest of no ordinary type. With comparatively little of what Protestants call superstition, with great courage and sincerity, with a nature singularly guileless and noble, his priestly vocation, although pursued, according to his biographer, with unbridled zeal, did not stifle his human sympathies and aspirations. He could not believe that his faith compelled him 'to renounce sense and reason,' or that a priest was not free to speak, act, and think like other men. Indeed, the Abbé Gratry makes a kind of apology for his friend's free-speaking in this respect, and endeavours to explain it. Perreyve was the beloved disciple of Lacordaire, who left him all his manuscripts, notes, and papers, and he himself attained the position of a great pulpit orator."—PALM MALL GAZETTE.

THE LAST DAYS OF PÈRE GRATRY. By PÈRE ADOLPHE PERRAUD, of the Oratory, and Professor of La Sorbonne. Translated by special permission. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

S. FRANCIS DE SALES, BISHOP AND PRINCE OF GENEVA. By the Author of "A Dominican Artist," "Life of Madame Louise de France," &c., &c. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"It is written with the delicacy, freshness, and absence of all affectation which characterised the former works by the same hand, and which render these books so very much more pleasant reading than are religious biographies in general. The character of S. Francis de Sales, Bishop of Geneva, is a charming one; a more simple, pure, and pious life it would be difficult to conceive. His unaffected humility, his freedom from dogmatism in an age when dogma was placed above religion, his freedom from bigotry in an age of persecution, were alike admirable."—STANDARD.

"The author of 'A Dominican Artist,' in writing this new life of the wise and loving Bishop and Prince of Geneva, has aimed less at historical or ecclesiastical investigation than at a vivid and natural representation of the inner mind and life of the subject of his biography, as it can be traced in his own writings and in those of his most intimate and affectionate friends. The book is written with the grave and quiet grace which characterizes the productions of its author, and cannot fail to please those readers who can sympathize with all forms of goodness and devotion to noble purpose."—WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

"A book which contains the record of a life as sweet, pure, and noble, as any man by divine help, granted to devout sincerity of soul, has been permitted to live upon earth. The example of this gentle but resolute and energetic spirit, wholly dedicated to the highest conceivable good, offering itself, with all the temporal uses of mental existence, to the service of infinite and eternal beneficence, is extremely touching. . . . It is a book worthy of acceptance."—DAILY NEWS.

"It is not a translation or adaptation, but an original work, and a very charming portrait of one of the most winning characters in the long gallery of Saints. And it is a matter of entire thankfulness to us to find a distinctively Anglican writer setting forward the good Bishop's work among Protestants, as a true missionary task to reclaim souls from deadly error, and bring them back to the truth."—UNION REVIEW.

THE SPIRIT OF S. FRANCIS DE SALES, BISHOP AND PRINCE OF GENEVA. Translated from the French by the Author of "The Life of S. Francis de Sales," "A Dominican Artist," &c., &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A SELECTION FROM THE SPIRITUAL LETTERS OF S. FRANCIS DE SALES, BISHOP AND PRINCE OF GENEVA.

Translated by the Author of "Life of S. Francis de Sales," "A Dominican Artist," &c. &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"It is a collection of epistolary correspondence of rare interest and excellence. With those who have read the Life, there cannot but have been a strong desire to know more of so beautiful a character as S. Francis de Sales. He was a model of Christian saintliness and religious virtue for all time, and one everything relating to whom, so great were the accomplishments of his mind as well as the devotion of his heart, has a charm which delights, instructs, and elevates."—CHURCH HERALD.

"A few months back we had the pleasure of welcoming the Life of S. Francis de Sales. Here is the promised sequel:—the 'Selection from his Spiritual Letters' then announced:—and a great boon it will be to many. The Letters are addressed to people of all sorts:—to men and to women:—to laity and to ecclesiastics, to people living in the world, or at court, and to the inmates of Religious Houses. And what an idea it gives one of the widely ramifying influence of one good man and of the untiring diligence of a man, who in spite of all his external duties, could find or make the time for all these letters. We hope that with our readers it may be totally needless to urge such a volume on their notice."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

THE REVIVAL OF PRIESTLY LIFE IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY IN FRANCE: a Sketch. By the Author of "A Dominican Artist," "Life of S. Francis de Sales," &c., &c. Crown 8vo. 9s.

"A book the authorship of which will command the respect of all who can honour sterling worth. No Christian, to whatever denomination he may belong, can read without quick sympathy and emotion these touching sketches of the early Oratorians and the Lazarists, whose devotion we can all admire." STANDARD.

"Few books contain more valuable information than this one, giving an account of the renewal of spiritual energy in the French Clergy in the sixteenth century. That revival was one of the strong evidences of the living power inherent in the Church, which always, when evil seems at a height, begins to right itself."—GUARDIAN.

CONSOLATIO ; or, Comfort for the Afflicted. Edited by the Rev. C. E. KENNAWAY. With a Preface by SAMUEL WILBERFORCE, D.D., Lord Bishop of Winchester. New Edition. Small 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"A charming collection from the best writers of passages suitable in seasons of sickness and afflictions."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"A very valuable collection of extracts from writers of every school. The volume is an elegant one."—CHURCH TIMES.

"A very useful collection of devotional extracts from the histories of good men of very various schools of thought."—JOHN BULL.

"We are bound to admire the extreme beauty and the warm devotion of the majority of passages here collected to smooth the soul that sorrows, even though penned by men from whom we differ so much in doctrine."—ROCK.

"A work which we feel sure will find a welcome and also prove a soothing guest in the chamber of many an invalid."—RECORD.

THE BOOK OF CHURCH LAW. Being an exposition of the Legal Rights and Duties of the Clergy and Laity of the Church of England. By the REV. JOHN HENRY BLUNT, M.A., F.S.A. Revised by WALTER G. F. PHILLIMORE, B.C.L., Barrister-at-Law, and Chancellor of the Diocese of Lincoln. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"We have tested this work on various points of a crucial character, and have found it very accurate and full in its information. It embodies the results of the most recent acts of the Legislature on the clerical profession and the rights of the laity."—STANDARD.

"Already in our leading columns we have directed attention to Messrs. Blunt and Phillimore's 'Book of Church Law,' as an excellent manual for ordinary use. It is a book which should stand on every clergyman's shelves ready for use when any legal matter arises about which its possessor is in doubt. . . . It is to be hoped that the authorities at our Theological Colleges sufficiently recognize the value of a little legal knowledge on the part of the clergy to recommend this book to their students. It would serve admirably as the text-book for a set of lectures, and we trust we shall hear that its publication has done something to encourage the younger clergy to make them eyes masters of at least the general outlines of Ecclesiastical Law, as it relates to the Church of England."—CHURCH TIMES.

"There is a copious index, and the whole volume forms a Handy-book of Church Law down to the present time, which, if found on the library shelves of most of the clergy, would often save them from much unnecessary trouble, vexation, and expense."—NATIONAL CHURCH.

A HISTORY OF THE HOLY EASTERN CHURCH. The Patriarchate of Antioch. By the Rev. JOHN MASON NEALE, D.D., late Warden of Sackville College, East Grinstead. A Posthumous Fragment. Together with Memoirs of the Patriarchs of Antioch, by Constantius, Patriarch of Constantinople; translated from the Greek, and three Appendices. Edited, with an Introduction, by the Rev. GEORGE WILLIAMS, B.D., Vicar of Ringwood, late Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

VOICES OF COMFORT: Original and Selected. Edited by the Rev. THOMAS VINCENT FOSBERY, M.A., Hon. Chaplain to the late Bishop of Winchester, and sometime Vicar of St. Giles's, Reading. Small 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"Certainly the most beautiful, as well as one of the best, of the many books of selections which have come before us."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"Mr. Fosbery has ministered to an obvious want by this felicitous collection of homilies, prayers, and hymns, which are so arranged as to give a unity to the whole work, while the several portions are integers in themselves, and may be perused piecemeal by those who have not the leisure or wish to read the book from cover to cover."—MORNING POST.

"We strongly recommend this excellent manual, in the certainty that a more satisfactory aid to devotion has been very seldom, if ever, compiled."—CHURCH HERALD.

"One of the happiest volumes of its kind. The whole work shows not merely diligent and wise compilation, but breathes a spirit of earnest piety and sober orthodoxy."—JOHN BULL.

HYMNS AND POEMS FOR THE SICK AND SUFFERING. In connexion with the Service for the Visitation of the Sick. Selected from various Authors. Edited by T. V. FOSBERY, M.A., Vicar of St. Giles's, Reading, Editor of "Voices of Comfort," &c. New Edition. Small 8vo. 3s. 6d.

ANCIENT HYMNS. From the Roman Breviary. For Domestic Use every Morning and Evening of the Week, and on the Holy Days of the Church. To which are added, Original Hymns, principally of Commemoration and Thanksgiving for Christ's Holy Ordinances. By RICHARD MANT, D.D., sometime Lord Bishop of Down and Connor. New Edition. Small 8vo. 5s.

"Real poetry wedded to words that breathe the purest and the sweetest spirit of Christian devotion. The translations from the old Latin Hymnal are close and faithful renderings."—STANDARD.

"As a Hymn writer Bishop Mant deservedly occupies a prominent place in the esteem of Churchmen, and we doubt not that many will be the readers who will welcome this new edition of his translations and original compositions."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

"A new edition of Bishop Mant's 'Ancient Hymns from the Roman Breviary' forms a handsome little volume, and it is interesting to compare some of these translations with the more modern ones of our own day. While we have no hesitation in awarding the palm to the latter, the former are an evidence of the earliest germs of that yearning of the devout mind for something better than Tate and Brady, and which is now so richly supplied."—CHURCH TIMES.

"This valuable manual will be of great assistance to all compilers of Hymn-Books. The translations are graceful, clear, and forcible, and the original hymns deserve the highest praise. Bishop Mant has caught the very spirit of true psalmody, his metre flows musically, and there is a tuneful ring in his verses which especially adapts them for congregational singing."—ROCK.

YESTERDAY, TO-DAY, AND FOR EVER: A Poem in Twelve Books. By E. H. BICKERSTETH, M.A., Vicar of Christ Church, Hampstead. Eighth Edition. Small 8vo. 6s.

An Edition for Presentation, elegantly printed with Red Rules. 4to. 10s. 6d.

"A very magnificent presentation edition. This blank verse poem in twelve books has made its way in the religious world of England and America without much help from the critics."—TIMES.

"Mr. Bickersteth writes like a man who cultivates at once reverence and earnestness of thought."—GUARDIAN.

"The most simple, the richest, and the most perfect sacred poem which recent days have produced."—MORNING ADVERTISER.

"A poem worth reading, worthy of attentive study; full of noble thoughts, beautiful diction, and high imagination."—STANDARD.

"In these light miscellany days there is a spiritual refreshment in the spectacle of a man girding up the loins of his mind to the task of producing a genuine epic. And it is true poetry. There is a definiteness, a crispness about it, which in these moist, viewy, hazy days is no less invigorating than novel."—EDINBURGH DAILY REVIEW.

THE TWO BROTHERS, and other Poems. By EDWARD HENRY BICKERSTETH, M.A., Vicar of Christ Church, Hampstead, and Chaplain to the Bishop of Ripon, Author of "Yesterday, To-day, and for Ever." Second Edition. Small 8vo. 6s.

ALLEGORIES AND TALES. By the Rev. W. E. HEYGATE, M.A., Rector of Brighstone. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"It is eminently original, and every one of its sixty-three short allegories is a story that the dullest child will read and the intelligent child will understand and enjoy. Grave thought, kindly raillery, biting sarcasm, grim humour, sincere indignation, wise counsel, a broad charity, and other characteristics, run through the allegories, many of which are highly poetical and good models of that style of composition."—EDINBURGH COURANT.

Mr. Heygate's volume contains about sixty short tales or allegories, all rife with good teaching, plainly set forth, and written in a very engaging and attractive style. As a present for children this book would be at once acceptable and beneficial. It can be highly commended."—CHURCH HERALD.

"There are both grace and precision about these 'Allegories and Tales,' which make them charming to read either for young or for old. The stories are some of them quaint, some of them picturesque, all of them pleasant; and the moral they enclose shines out soft and clear as through a crystal. This is a book that may be recommended for a present, not only for young people, but for those of larger growth."—ATHENÆUM.

"The Rector of Brighstone has the gift of writing moral and spiritual lessons for the young in the most attractive fashion. His 'Allegories and Tales' are excellent specimens of stories, with a moral, in which the moral is not obtrusive and yet is not lost."—ENGLISH INDEPENDENT.

"A book of very great beauty and power. Mr. Heygate is a thoughtful, earnest and able writer, on whom more than any one is fallen in a striking manner the mantle of the great author of 'Agathos.'"—JOHN BULL.

THE CHORISTER'S GUIDE. By W. A. BARRETT, Mus. Bac., Oxon, of St. Paul's Cathedral, Author of "Flowers and Festivals." Square 16mo. 2s. 6d.

"... One of the most useful books of instruction for choristers—and, we may add, choral singers generally—that has ever emanated from the musical press. . . . Mr. Barrett's teaching is not only conveyed to his readers with the consciousness of being master of his subject, but he employs words terse and clear, so that his meaning may be promptly caught by the neophyte. . . ."—ATHENÆUM.

"In this little volume we have a manual long called for by the requirements of church music. In a series of thirty-two lessons it gives, with an admirable conciseness, and an equally observable completeness, all that is necessary a chorister should be taught out of a book, and a great deal calculated to have a value as bearing indirectly upon his actual practice in singing."—MUSICAL STANDARD.

FLOWERS AND FESTIVALS; or, Directions for the Floral Decoration of Churches. By W. A. BARRETT, Mus. Bac., Oxon., of St. Paul's Cathedral, Author of "The Chorister's Guide." With Coloured Illustrations. Second Edition. Square Crown 8vo. 5s.

THE PERMANENCE OF CHRISTIANITY considered in Eight Lectures preached before the University of Oxford, in the year 1872, on the Foundation of the late Rev. John Bampton, M.A. By JOHN RICHARD TURNER EATON, B.A., late Fellow and Tutor of Merton College, Rector of Lapworth, Warwickshire. 8vo. 12s.

"He has brought to bear upon the work a vast and varied stock of reading; great acuteness of analysis; great fairness and composure of judgement. Altogether, these Lectures are a valuable contribution to the Christian evidences."—GUARDIAN.

"The general style of the Lectures is grave, logical, and weighty; and the author everywhere gives his readers proof of a highly cultivated mind, firmness and clearness of view, as well as wide and varied learning."—STANDARD.

"The materials are well arranged, and the arguments of opponents fairly stated."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"It indicates extensive reading in all quarters bearing upon the great controversies to which it relates; it bears throughout the marks of vigorous and independent thought; it is marked by a spirit of the most candid fairness; it is clearly and forcibly written, and it is often eloquent."—BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"Solid and satisfactory Lectures. . . . The lecturer never forgets that it is the cause of truth in which he is engaged, and he has enhanced the substantial value of his work by the candid and impartial spirit in which he has undertaken and completed it."—WEEKLY REGISTER.

STONES OF THE TEMPLE; OR, LESSONS FROM THE FABRIC AND FURNITURE OF THE CHURCH. By WALTER FIELD, M.A., F.S.A., Vicar of Godmersham. With numerous Illustrations. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"Anyone who wishes for simple information on the subjects of Church-architecture and furniture cannot do better than consult 'Stones of the Temple.' Mr. Field modestly disclaims any intention of supplanting the existing regular treatises, but his book shows an amount of research, and a knowledge of what he is talking about, which make it practically useful as well as pleasant. The woodcuts are numerous and some of them very pretty."—GRAPHIC.

"A very charming book, by the Rev. Walter Field, who was for years Secretary of one of the leading Church Societies. Mr. Field has a loving reverence for the beauty of the domus mansionalis Dei, as the old law books called the Parish Church. . . . Thoroughly sound in Church feeling, Mr. Field has chosen the medium of a tale to embody real incidents illustrative of the various portions of his subject. There is no attempt at elaboration of the narrative, which, indeed, is rather a string of anecdotes than a story, but each chapter brings home to the mind its own lesson, and each is illustrated with some very interesting engravings. . . . The work will properly command a hearty reception from Churchmen. The footnotes are occasionally most valuable, and are always pertinent, and the text is sure to be popular with young folks for Sunday reading."—STANDARD.

"Mr. Field's chapters on brasses, chancel screens, crosses, encaustic tiles, mural paintings, porches and pavements, are agreeably written, and people with a turn for Ritualism will no doubt find them edifying. The volume, as we have said, is not without significance for readers who are unable to sympathize with the object of the writer. The illustrations of Church-architecture and Church ornaments are very attractive."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

A SHADOW OF DANTE. Being an Essay towards Studying Himself, his World, and his Pilgrimage. By MARIA FRANCESCA ROSSETTI. Second Edition. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

"The 'Shadow of Dante' is a well-conceived and inviting volume, designed to recommend the 'Divina Commedia' to English readers, and to facilitate the study and comprehension of its contents."—ATHENÆUM.

"And it is in itself a true work of art, a whole finely conceived, and carried out with sustained power,—one of those reproductions and admirations of great works, in which mere servile copying disappears, and which are only possible to a mind which, however inferior to its original, is yet of the same order and temperament, with an unusual faculty for taking the impressions of that original and reflecting them undimmed. It is much to say of a volume like this. But it is not too much to say, when, after going through it, we consider the thorough knowledge of the subject shown in it, the patient skill with which the intricate and puzzling arrangements of the poem, full of what we call the conceits and puzzles of the contemporary philosophy, are unravelled and made intelligible; the discrimination and high principle with which so ardent a lover of the great poet blames his excesses; the high and noble Christian faith which responds to his; and, lastly, the gift of eloquent speech, keen, rich, condensed, expressive, which seems to have passed into the writer from the loving study of the greatest master in his own tongue of all the inimitable harmonies of language—the tenderest, the deepest, the most awful."—GUARDIAN.

"The work introduces us not merely to the author's life and the political and ecclesiastical conjunctures under which he lived, but to the outlines of the Catholicised systems of ethics, astronomy, and geography which he interpreted in classifying his spirits and assigning them their dwellings; as also to the drift of his leading allegories; and finally, to the general conduct of his poem—which is amply illustrated by citations from the most literal verse translations. We find the volume furnished with useful diagrams of the Dantean universe, of Hell, Purgatory, and the 'Rose of the Blessed,' and adorned with a beautiful group of the likenesses of the poet, and with symbolic figures (on the binding) in which the taste and execution of Mr. D. G. Rossetti will be recognised. The exposition appears to us remarkably well arranged and digested; the author's appreciation of Dante's religious sentiments and opinions is peculiarly hearty, and her style refreshingly independent and original."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"It bears traces throughout of having been due to a patient, loving and appreciative study of the great poet, as he is exhibited, not merely in the 'Divina Commedia,' but in his other writings. The result has been a book which is not only delightful in itself to read, but is admirably adapted as an encouragement to those students who wish to obtain a preliminary survey of the land before they attempt to follow Dante through his long and arduous pilgrimage. Of all poets Dante stands most in need of such assistance as this book offers."—SATURDAY REVIEW.

PARISH MUSINGS; OR, DEVOTIONAL POEMS. By JOHN S. B. MONSELL, LL.D., Rural Dean, and Rector of St. Nicholas, Guildford. Fine Edition. Small 8vo. 5s. Cheap Edition, 18mo, limp cloth, 1s. 6d.; or in Cover, 1s.

THE LIFE OF JUSTIFICATION. A Series of Lectures delivered in Substance at All Saints', Margaret Street, in Lent 1870. By the Rev. GEORGE BODY, B.A., Rector of Kirkby Misperton. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—Justification the Want of Humanity—Christ our Justification—Union with Christ the Condition of Justification—Conversion and Justification—The Life of Justification—The Progress and End of Justification.

"On the whole we have rarely met with a more clear, intelligible and persuasive statement of the truth as regards the important topics on which the volume treats. Sermon 11 in particular, will strike every one by its eloquence and beauty, but we scarcely like to specify it, lest in praising it we should seem to disparage the other portions of this admirable little work."—CHURCH TIMES.

"These discourses show that their author's position is due to something more and higher than mere fluency, gesticulation, and flexibility of voice. He appears as having drunk deeply at the fountain of St. Augustine, and as understanding how to translate the burning words of that mighty genius into the current language of to-day."—UNION REVIEW.

"There is real power in these sermons:—power, real power, and plenty of it. . . . There is such a moral veraciousness about him, such a profound and over-mastering belief that Christ has proved a bona-fide cure for unholiness, and such an intensity of eagerness to lead others to seek and profit by that means of attainment, the true sanctity which alone can enter Heaven—that we wonder not at the crowds which hang upon his preaching, nor at the success of his fervid appeals to the human conscience. If any one doubts our verdict, let him buy this volume. No one will regret its perusal."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

THE LIFE OF TEMPTATION. A Course of Lectures delivered in Substance at St. Peter's, Eaton-square, in Lent, 1872; also at All Saints', Margaret Street, in Lent, 1869. By the Rev. GEORGE BODY, B.A., Rector of Kirkby Misperton, Yorkshire. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—The Leading into Temptation—The Rationale of Temptation—Why we are Tempted—Safety in Temptation—With Jesus in Temptation—The End of Temptation.

"Regeneration and conversion seem here to occupy their proper places in the Christian economy, and the general subject of temptation is worked out with considerable ability."—CHURCH TIMES.

"This is another volume of simple, earnest, soul-stirring words, dealing with the mysteries of Christian experience."—LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"A Collection of sermons, pious, earnest, and eloquent."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

THE KNIGHT OF INTERCESSION, AND OTHER POEMS.

By the Rev. S. J. STONE, M.A., Pembroke College, Oxford. Second Edition. Small 8vo. 6s.

"Mr. Stone has now given to the public a collection of poems, widely different in form, which enable us to measure more accurately his powers, not merely as a hymnist, but as a poet; and though we would not injure a growing reputation by overstating his merits, yet we can safely say that his volume contains much genuine poetry which will be read with unqualified pleasure. . . . It would be ungrateful of us to put down this volume without expressing the great pleasure it has afforded us, and our high appreciation of the valuable services which its author is rendering to the Church."—CHURCH BELLS.

"We all know him so well as the author of the beautiful processional hymn 'The Church's One Foundation,' the Lenten hymn 'Wary of Earth,' and other favourites, that we were fully prepared for the pleasure that awaited us in perusing this volume."—CHURCH OPINION.

"The extracts we have thus given, differing as they do alike in subject and in style, present fair specimens of the varied interest of the volume, and of the poetic powers of its author. Most of our readers, we think, will agree with us that the publication is well-timed, and that it has much in it that is both pleasant and profitable reading."—CHURCH HERALD.

"In the 'Knight of Intercession' and other poems we have the outpourings of a pure and devotional spirit, in language of unassuming and yet genuine poetry, rising at times, naturally and without effort, to a quiet but real beauty."—SCOTSMAN.

"Mr. Stone, it is clear, has studied all the best models, and has been influenced by them; but he maintains through all a distinctly individual note, and gives us real music. . . . There are true touches in the Idylls, and some of the poems on pictures are remarkably expressive and skilful, though nothing is more difficult than the proper working out of such themes. We like some of the sonnets—some of them are exceptionally sweet and finished."—NONCONFORMIST.

"Well edited, excellent type, good paper, and in all respects admirably got up. Its review of affairs, Home, Colonial, and Foreign, is fair, concise, and complete."—MINING QUARTERLY.

"Solidly valuable, as well as interesting."—STANDARD.

"Comprehensive and well executed."—SPECTATOR.

"The whole work being well-written, and compiled with care and judgment, it is interesting reading for the present day, will be more useful as a work of reference in future years, and will be most valuable of all to readers of another generation. Every student of history knows the worth, for the time that it covers, of the old 'Annual Register,' and this new series is better done and more comprehensive than its predecessor."—EXAMINER.

"This volume of the new series of the 'Annual Register' seems well and carefully compiled. The narrative is accurate, and it is obvious that the writers have striven to be impartial."—ATHENÆUM.

"The whole of the compilation, however, is readable, and some of its more important parts are very well done. Such is, among other historical portions, the account of the situation in France before and at the beginning of the war. The narrative of the military events is clear, comprehensive, and attractive."—NATION (NEW YORK).

PRAYERS AND MEDITATIONS FOR THE HOLY COMMUNION. With a Preface by C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. With rubrics and borders in red. Royal 32mo. 2s. 6d.

"Devout beauty is the special character of this new manual, and it ought to be a favourite. Rarely has it happened to us to meet with so remarkable a combination of thorough practicalness with that almost poetic warmth which is the highest flower of genuine devotion. It deserves to be placed along with the manual edited by Mr. Keble so shortly before his decease, not as superseding it, for the scope of the two is different, but to be taken along with it. Nothing can exceed the beauty and fulness of the devotions before communion in Mr. Keble's book, but we think that in some points the devotions here given after Holy Communion are even superior to it."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"Bishop Ellicott has edited a book of 'Prayers and Meditations for the Holy Communion,' which, among Eucharistic manuals, has its own special characteristic. The Bishop recommends it to the newly confirmed, to the tender-hearted and the devout, as having been compiled by a youthful person, and as being marked by a peculiar 'freshness.' Having looked through the volume, we have pleasure in seconding the recommendations of the good Bishop. We know of no more suitable manual for the newly confirmed, and nothing more likely to engage the sympathies of youthful hearts. There is a union of the deepest spirit of devotion, a rich expression of experimental life, with a due recognition of the objects of faith, such as is not always to be found, but which characterises this manual in an eminent degree."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"The Bishop of Gloucester's imprimatur is attached to 'Prayers and Meditations for the Holy Communion,' intended as a manual for the recently confirmed, nicely printed, and theologically sound."—CHURCH TIMES.

"Among the supply of Eucharistic Manuals, one deserves special attention and commendation. 'Prayers and Meditations' merits the Bishop of Gloucester's epithets of 'warm, devout, and fresh.' And it is thoroughly English Church besides."—GUARDIAN.

"We are by no means surprised that Bishop Ellicott should have been so much struck with this little work, on accidentally seeing it in manuscript, as to urge its publication, and to preface it with his commendation. The devotion which it breathes is truly fervent, and the language attractive, and as proceeding from a young person the work is altogether not a little striking."—RECORD.

EIGHT LECTURES ON THE MIRACLES. Being the Bampton Lectures for 1865. By J. B. MOZLEY, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity, and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford. Third Edition, Revised. Crown Svo. 7s. 6d.

A THEORY OF HARMONY. Founded on the Tempered Scale.

With Questions and Exercises for the Use of Students. By JOHN STAINER, Mus. Doc., M.A., Magd. Coll., Oxon., Organist to St. Paul's Cathedral. Second Edition. Royal 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"It is the first work of its class that needs no apology for its introduction, as it is really much needed especially by teachers, who would fail without the aid of its principles to account for many of the effects in modern music, used in direct opposition to the teaching of the schools. It is difficult, if not impossible, to give a more elaborate description of a book destined to effect an entire change in musical teaching without entering into details that could not but prove uninteresting to the general readers, while to the musician and amateur, the possession of the book itself is recommended as a valuable confirmation of ideas that exist to a large extent in the minds of every one who has ever thought about music, and who desires to see established a more uniform basis of study. The great and leading characteristic of the work is its logical reasoning and definitions, a character not possessed by any previous book on the subject, and for this Dr. Stainer's theory is certain to gain ground, and be the means of opening an easy and pleasant path in a road hitherto beset with the thorns and briars of perplexing technicalities."—MORNING POST.

"Dr. Stainer is a learned musician, and his book supplies a manual of information as well as a rich repository of musical erudition in the form of classical quotations from the great masters."—JOHN BULL.

"Dr. Stainer, in his thoughtful book, sees clearly of amalgamating opposing systems in order to found a theory of harmony. He bases his work on the tempered scale, and he develops and illustrates his theory by questions and exercises for the use of students. His opening exposition of the rudiments of music is clear: when he reaches the regions of harmony he comes on debateable ground."—ATHENÆUM.

"To the student perplexed and chained down by the multitudinous rules of the old theorists, we cannot give better comfort than to advise him to read forthwith Dr. Stainer's ingenious and thoughtful book. It is exceedingly well got up, and from the clearness of the type used, very easy and pleasant to read."—CHOIR.

THE HAPPINESS OF THE BLESSED CONSIDERED

as to the Particulars of their State: their Recognition of each other in that State: and its Differences of Degrees. To which are added Musings on the Church and her Services. By RICHARD MANT, D.D., sometime Lord Bishop of Down and Connor. New Edition. Small 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"A welcome republication of a treatise once highly valued, and which can never lose its value. Many of our readers already know the fulness and discrimination with which the author treats his subject, which must be one of the most delightful topics of meditation to all whose heart is where the only true treasure is, and particularly to those who are entering upon the evening of life."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"The value of this book needs not to be referred to, its standard character having been for many years past established. The edition in which it reappears has evidently been carefully prepared, and will be the means of making it more generally known."—BELL'S MESSENGER.

"All recognise the authority of the command to set the affections on things above, and such works as the one now before us will be found helpful towards this good end. We are, therefore, sincerely glad that Messrs. Rivington have brought out a new edition of Bishop Mant's valuable treatise."—RECORD.

"This beautiful and devotional treatise, which it is impossible to read without feeling a more deepened interest in the eternal blessedness which awaits the true servants of our God, concludes very appropriately with 'Musings on the Church and her Services,' which we cordially recommend to our readers."—ROCK.

LIFE OF S. VINCENT DE PAUL. With Introduction by the Rev. R. F. WILSON, M.A., Prebendary of Salisbury and Vicar of Rownhams, and Chaplain to the Bishop of Salisbury. Crown 8vo. 9s.

"A most readable volume, illustrating facts and arrangements, which from the circumstances of the day are invested with peculiar interest."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

"All will be pleased at reading the present admirably written narrative, in which we do not know whether to admire more the candour and earnestness of the writer or his plain, sensible, and agreeable style."—WEEKLY REGISTER.

"We trust that this deeply interesting and beautifully written biography will be extensively circulated in England."—CHURCH HERALD.

"We heartily recommend the introduction to the study of all concerned with ordinations."—GUARDIAN.

"We are glad that S. Vincent de Paul, one of the most remarkable men produced by the Gallican Church, has at last found a competent English biographer. The volume before us has evidently been written with conscientious care and scrupulous industry. It is based on the best authorities, which have been compared with praiseworthy diligence; its style is clear, elegant, and unambitious; and it shows a fine appreciation of the life and character of the man whom it commemorates."

—SCOTTISH GUARDIAN.

"Mr. Wilson has done his work admirably and evidently con amore, and he completely proves the thesis with which he starts, viz., that in the life of the Saint there is a homeliness and simplicity, and a general absence of the miraculous or the more ascetic type of saintliness."—JOHN BULL.

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH UNDER THE ROMAN EMPIRE, A.D. 30-476. By the Rev. A. D. CRAKE, B.A., Chaplain of All Saints' School, Bloxham. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"A compendious history of the Christian Church under the Roman Empire will be hailed with pleasure by all readers of ecclesiastical lore. . . . The author is quite free from the spirit of controversialism; wherever he refers to a prevalent practice of ancient times he gives his authority. In his statement of facts or opinions he is always accurate and concise, and his manual is doubtless destined to a lengthened period of popularity."—MORNING POST.

"It is very well done. It gives a very comprehensive view of the progress of events, ecclesiastical and political, at the great centres of civilisation during the first five centuries of Christianity."—DAILY NEWS.

"In his well-planned and carefully written volume of 500 pages Mr. Crake has supplied a well-known and long-felt want. Relying on all the highest and best authorities for his main facts and conclusions, and wisely making use of all modern research, Mr. Crake has spared neither time nor labour to make his work accurate, trustworthy, and intelligent."

—STANDARD.

"Really interesting, well suited to the needs of those for whom it was prepared, and its Church tone is unexceptionable."—CHURCH TIMES.

"As a volume for students and the higher forms of our public schools it is admirably adapted."—CHURCH HERALD.

THE ANNOTATED BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER; being an Historical, Ritual, and Theological Commentary on the Devotional System of the Church of England. Edited by the Rev. JOHN HENRY BLUNT, M.A., F.S.A., Author of "The History of the Reformation," "Directorium Pastorale," Editor of "The Dictionary of Theology," &c. Sixth edition, revised. Imperial 8vo. 36s., or half-bound in morocco, 48s.

OUR MOTHER CHURCH: being Simple Talk on High Topics. By ANNE MERCIER. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"We have never seen a book for girls of its class which commends itself to us more particularly than 'Our Mother Church' by Mrs. Jerome Mercier. The author, who is the wife of an earnest parish priest of the Anglican school, near London, calls her work 'simple talk on great subjects,' and calls it by a name that describes it almost as completely as we could do in a longer notice than we can spare the volume. Here are the headings of the chapters:—'The Primitive Church,' 'Primitive Places and Modes of Worship,' 'The Early English Church,' 'The Monastic Orders,' 'The Friars,' 'A Review of Church History,' 'The Prayer Book,' (four chapters), 'Symbolism,' 'Church Architecture,' 'Windows and Bells,' 'Church Music,' 'Church Work.'

No one can fail to comprehend the beautifully simple, devout, and appropriate language in which Mrs. Mercier embodies what she has to say; and for the facts with which she deals she has taken good care to have their accuracy assured."—STANDARD.

"The plan of this pleasant-looking book is excellent. It is a kind of Mrs. Markham on the Church of England, written especially for girls, and we shall not be surprised to find it become a favourite in schools. . . . It is really a conversational hand-book to the English Church's history, doctrine, and ritual, compiled by a very diligent reader from some of the best modern Anglican sources."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

respecting the Holy Bible, the Prayer Book, the Church, the Ministry, Divine Worship, the Creeds, &c., &c. By JOHN HENRY BLUNT, M.A. New Edition. Small 8vo. 3s. 6d.

LIBER PRECUM PUBLICARUM ECCLESIAE ANGLI-

CANÆ. A GULIELMO BRIGHT, A.M., et PETRO GOLDSMITH MEDD, A.M., Presbyteris, Collegii Universitatis in Acad. Oxon. Sociis, Latine redidit. New Edition, with all the Rubrics in red. Small 8vo. 6s.

THE PSALMS. Translated from the Hebrew. With Notes, chiefly

Exegetical. By WILLIAM KAY, D.D., Rector of Great Leghs; late Principal of Bishop's College, Calcutta. Second Edition. 8vo. 12s. 6d.

"Like a sound Churchman, he reverences Scripture, upholding its authority against sceptics; and he does not denounce such as differ from him in opinion with a dogmatism unhappily too common at the present day. Hence, readers will be disposed to consider his conclusions worthy of attention; or perhaps to adopt them without inquiry. It is superfluous to say that the translation is better and more accurate on the whole than our received one, or that it often reproduces the sense of the original happily."—ATHENÆUM.

"Dr. Kay has profound reverence for Divine truth and exhibits considerable read- ing, with the power to make use of it."—BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"The execution of the work is careful and scholarly."—UNION REVIEW.

"To mention the name of Dr. Kay is enough to secure respectful attention to his new translation of the Psalms. It is enriched with exegetical notes containing a wealth of sound learning, closely occasionally, perhaps too closely condensed. Good care is taken of the student not learned in Hebrew; we hope the Doctor's example will prevent any abuse of this consideration, and stimulate those who profit by it to follow him into the very text of the ancient Revelation."—JOHN BULL.

AID TO PRAYER; OR, THOUGHTS ON THE PRACTICE OF DEVOTION. With Forms of Prayer for Private Use. By

DANIEL MOORE, M.A., Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, and Vicar of Holy Trinity, Paddington, Author of "Sermons on Special Occasions," Hulsean Lectures on "The Age and the Gospel," &c. Second Edition. Square 32mo. 2s. 6d.

"The valuable characteristic of this work will be recognised by every serious, thoughtful Christian, in a word, by all who perceive and lament the growing tendency to prefer the claims of external service, ecclesiastical controversy, or multiplied activities to the practice of private devotion. 'Aids to Prayer' offers both encouragement and help to those who aspire to higher attainments in the Divine Life. Every page bears the impress of a matured judgment, and of an experimental acquaintance with a subject confessedly difficult, and of supreme importance."—RECORD.

"Eloquently, ably, and practically written."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

"'Aids to Prayer' has deservedly reached a second edition. The sermon method of treatment has been wisely discontinued."—JOHN BULL.

A COMPANION TO THE OLD TESTAMENT. Being a Plain Commentary on Scripture History, down to the Birth of our Lord. Small Svo. 3s. 6d.

Also in Two Parts :—

Part I.—The Creation of the World to the Reign of Saul.

Part II.—The Reign of Saul to the Birth of our Lord.

"A most admirable Companion to the Old Testament, being far the most concise yet complete commentary on Old Testament history with which we have met. Here are combined orthodoxy and learning, an intelligent and at the same time interesting summary of the leading facts of the sacred story. It should be a text-book in every school, and its value is immensely enhanced by the copious and complete index."—JOHN BULL.

"This will be found a very valuable aid to the right understanding of the Bible. It throws the whole Scripture narrative into one from the creation downwards, the author thus condensing Prideaux, Shuckford, and Kussell, and in the most reverential manner bringing to his aid the writings of all modern annotators and chronologists. There are no lengthy comments, no visionary theories, nothing speculative; all is plain matter of fact, intelligibly stated. The book is one that should have a wide circulation amongst teachers and students of all denominations."—BOOKSELLER.

Testament narrative, put together so as to explain the connection and bearing of its contents, and written in a very good tone; with a final chapter on the history of the Jews between the Old and New Testaments. It will be found very useful for its purpose. It does not confine itself to merely chronological difficulties, but comments briefly upon the religious bearing of the text also."—GUARDIAN.

"The handbook before us is so full and satisfactory, considering its compass, and sets forth the history of the old covenant with such conscientious minuteness, that it cannot fail to prove a godsend to candidates for examination in the Rudimenta Religionis as well as in the corresponding school at Cambridge. . . . Throughout his work the writer of this 'companion,' 'commentary,' or 'handbook,' exhibits at the same time extensive research into the best sources of information and enlightenment as to the sacred history, and an independent, though cautious, judgment in his choice between conflicting theories and explanations."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

PROPHECIES AND THE PROPHETIC SPIRIT IN THE CHRISTIAN ERA; an Historical Essay. By JOHN J. IGN. VON DÖLLINGER. Translated, with Introduction, Notes, and Appendices, by ALFRED PLUMMER, M.A., Master of University College, Durham, late Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Oxford. Svo. 10s. 6d.

FABLES RESPECTING THE POPES OF THE MIDDLE AGES. A Contribution to Ecclesiastical History. By JOHN J. IGN. VON DÖLLINGER. Translated, with Introduction and Appendices, by ALFRED PLUMMER, M.A., Master of University College, Durham, late Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Oxford. Svo. 14s.

DIRECTORIUM PASTORALE. The Principles and Practice of Pastoral Work in the Church of England. By the Rev. JOHN HENRY BLUNT, M.A., F.S.A., Editor of "The Annotated Book of Common Prayer," &c. &c. Third Edition, revised. Crown Svo. 7s. 6d.

"This is the third edition of a work which has become deservedly popular as the best extant exposition of the principles and practice of the pastoral work in the Church of England. Its hints and suggestions are based on practical experience, and it is further recommended by the majority of our Bishops at the ordination of priests and deacons."—STANDARD.

"Its practical usefulness to the parochial clergy is proved by the acceptance it has already received at their hands, and no faithful parish priest, who is working in real earnest for the extension of spiritual instruction amongst all classes of his flock will rise from the perusal of its pages without having obtained some valuable hints as to the best mode of bringing home our Church's system to the hearts of his people."—NATIONAL CHURCH.

THE SHEPHERD OF HERMAS. Translated into English, with an Introduction and Notes. By CHARLES H. HOOLE, M.A., Senior Student of Christ Church, Oxford. Small Svo. 4s. 6d.

SERMONS ON CERTAIN OF THE LESS PROMINENT FACTS AND REFERENCES IN SACRED STORY. By HENRY MELVILL, B.D., late Canon of St. Paul's, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen. New Edition. Two vols. Crown 8vo. 5s. each.

"We are glad to see this new edition of what we have always considered to be Melvill's best sermons, because in them we have his best thoughts. . . . Many of these sermons are the strongest arguments yet adduced for internal evidence of the veracity of the Scriptural narratives."—STANDARD.

"Many who admire elegant phraseology, and the other now rarely exhibited constituents of pulpit eloquence, will be glad to have in a convenient shape a judicious selection of Canon Melvill's sermons. Mr. Melvill was one of the few really successful preachers of our day."—EXAMINER.

"The sermons of the lamented Melvill are too well known to require any commendation from us. We have here all the power of rhetoric, and the grace and beauty of style, for which the author has been distinguished, and which have contributed to render him a model to preachers, and given him a representative position in the history of the English pulpit."—WEEKLY REVIEW.

"Polished, classical, and winning, these sermons bear the marks of literary labour. A study of them will aid the modern preacher to refine and polish his discourses, and to add to the vigour which is now the fashion the graces of chastened eloquence and winning rhetoric."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

SELECTION FROM THE SERMONS PREACHED DURING THE LATTER YEARS OF HIS LIFE, IN THE PARISH CHURCH OF BARNES, AND IN THE CATHEDRAL OF ST. PAUL'S. By HENRY MELVILL, B.D., late Canon of St. Paul's, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen. Two vols. Crown 8vo. 5s. each.

"Melvill's chief characteristic was humility, that truest mark of real nobility of soul and of genuine genius; and his sole actuating principle in life was devotion to duty—duty to God and duty to man, and never were the two more beautifully blended together than in him. 'While the pure truths of the Gospel,' observes his biographer in the memoir prefixed to these sermons, 'flowed so persuasively from his lips, the pure spirit of Christianity ever reigned in his heart, and the purest charity influenced his every thought and every action.' . . . The style of Canon Melvill's sermons is rather Ciceronian than Demosthenic, rather splendid and measured than impetuous and fervid."—STANDARD.

"Two other volumes of the late Canon Melvill's sermons contain forty discourses preached by him in his later years, and they are prefaced by a short memoir of one of the worthiest and most impressive preachers of recent times."—EXAMINER.

"These outlines contain probably the last specimens of the work of a great master in the art of preaching the Gospel. In the sermons of Henry Melvill there are a certain dignity and elevation of style and handling which belong rather to the past than to the present.

There are in the sermons before us all Melvill's wonted grace of diction, strength of reasoning, and aptness of illustration."—WEEKLY REVIEW.

SERMONS. By HENRY MELVILL, B.D., late Canon of St. Paul's, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen. New Edition. Two vols. Crown 8vo. 5s. each. Sold separately.

"Messrs. Rivington have published very opportunely, at a time when Churchmen are thinking with satisfaction of the new blood infused into the Chapter of St. Paul's, sermons by Henry Melvill, who in his day was as celebrated as a preacher as is Canon Liddon now. The sermons are not only couched in elegant language, but are replete with matter which the younger clergy would do well to study."—JOHN BULL.

"Henry Melvill's intellect was large, his imagination brilliant, his ardour intense, and his style strong, fervid, and picturesque. Often he seemed to glow with the inspiration of a prophet."—AMERICAN QUARTERLY CHURCH REVIEW.

"It would be easy to quote portions of exceeding beauty and power. It was not, however, the charm of style, nor wealth of words, both which Canon Melvill possessed in so great abundance, that he relied on to win souls; but the power and spirit of Him who said, 'I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men to Me.'"—RECORD.

"Every one who can remember the days when Canon Melvill was the preacher of the day, will be glad to see these four-and-twenty of his sermons so nicely reproduced. His Sermons were all the result of real study and genuine reading, with far more theology in them than those of many who make much more profession of theology. There are sermons here which we can personally remember; it has been a pleasure to us to be reminded of them, and we are glad to see them brought before the present generation. We hope that they may be studied, for they deserve it thoroughly."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"Few preachers have had more admirers than the Rev. Henry Melvill, and the new edition of his Sermons, in two volumes, will doubtless find plenty of purchasers. The Sermons abound in thought, and the thoughts are couched in English which is at once elegant in construction and easy to read."—CHURCH TIMES.

"The Sermons of Canon Melvill, now republished in two handy volumes, need only to be mentioned to be sure of a hearty welcome. Sound learning, well-weighed words, calm and keen logic, and solemn devoutness, mark the whole series of masterly discourses, which embrace some of the chief doctrines of the Church, and set them forth in clear and Scriptural strength."—STANDARD.

"There is not a better companion to be found for the season than the beautiful 'Devotional Commentary on the Gospel Narrative,' by the Rev. Isaac Williams. . . . A rich mine for devotional and theological study."—GUARDIAN.

"So infinite are the depths and so innumerable the beauties of Scripture, and more particularly of the Gospels, that there is some difficulty in describing the manifold excellences of Williams' exquisite Commentary. Deriving its profound appreciation of Scripture from the writings of the early Fathers, it is only what every student knows must be true to say that it extracts a whole wealth of meaning from each sentence, each apparently faint allusion, each word in the text."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"Stands absolutely alone in our English literature; there is, we should say, no chance of its being superseded by any better book of its kind; and its merits are of the very highest order."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"It would be difficult to select a more useful present, at a small cost, than this series would be to a young man on his first entering into Holy Orders, and many, no doubt, will avail themselves of the republication of these useful volumes for this purpose. There is an abundance of sermon material to be drawn from any one of them."—CHURCH TIMES.

"This is, in the truest sense of the word, a 'Devotional Commentary' on the Gospel narrative, opening out everywhere, as it does, the spiritual beauties and blessedness of the Divine message; but it is something more than this, it meets difficulties almost by anticipation, and throws the light of learning over some of the very darkest passages in the New Testament."—ROCK.

"The author has skillfully combined and blended the narratives of the different Gospels, so as to give a synoptical view of the history; and though the commentary is called 'devotional,' it is scholarly and suggestive in other respects. The size of the work, extending, as it does, over eight volumes, may deter purchasers and readers; but each volume is complete in itself, and we recommend students to taste a sample of the author's quality. Some things they may question; but the volumes are really a helpful and valuable addition to our stores."—FREEMAN.

"The high and solemn verities of the Saviour's sufferings and death are treated with great reverence and ability. The thorough devoutness which pervades the book commends it to our heart. There is much to instruct and help the believer in the Christian life, no matter to what section of the Church he may belong."—WATCHMAN.

FEMALE CHARACTERS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. In a Series of Sermons. By the Rev. ISAAC WILLIAMS, B.D., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.

THE CHARACTERS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. In a Series of Sermons. By the Rev. ISAAC WILLIAMS, B.D., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. New Edition. Crown 8vo., 5s.

"This is one of the few volumes of published sermons that we have been able to read with real pleasure. They are written with a chastened elegance of language, and pervaded by a spirit of earnest and simple piety. Mr. Williams is evidently what would be called a very High Churchman. Occasionally his peculiar Church views are apparent; but buting a few passages here and there, these sermons will be read with profit by all 'who profess and call themselves Christians.'"—CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

"This is a new edition of a very popular—and deservedly popular—work on the biography of the Old Testament history. The characters are ably and profitably analysed, and that by the hand of a master of style and thought."

The principle of selection has been that of prominence; and partly, too, that of significance in the characters so ably delineated. A more masterly analysis of Scriptural characters we never read, nor any which are more calculated to impress the mind of the reader with feelings of love for what is good, and abhorrence for what is evil."—ROCK.

THE APOCALYPSE; WITH NOTES AND REFLECTIONS. By the Rev. ISAAC WILLIAMS, B.D., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"This work, though probably less read than it deserves to be, has always struck us as the deepest and most learned of all the series of commentaries with which this gifted author has enriched the Church."—CHURCH TIMES.

APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. By the Rev. ARTHUR W. HADDAN, B.D., Rector of Barton-on-the-Heath, and late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. 8vo. 12s.

"Mr. Haddan's estimate of the bearing of his subject, and of its special importance at the present juncture is characteristic, and will well repay attention."

Mr. Haddan is strictly argumentative throughout. He abstains with some strictness from everything which would divert either his reader or himself from accurate investigation of his reasoning. But his volume is thoroughly well written, clear and forcible in style, and fair in tone. It cannot but render valuable service in placing the claims of the Church in their true light before the English public."—GUARDIAN.

"Among the many standard theological works devoted to this important subject Mr. Haddan's will hold a high place."—STANDARD.

"We should be glad to see the volume widely circulated and generally read."—JOHN BULL.

"A weighty and valuable treatise, and we hope that the study of its sound and well-reasoned pages will do much to fix the importance, and the full meaning of the doctrine in question, in the minds of Church people."

"We hope that our extracts will lead our readers to study Mr. Haddan for themselves."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"This is not only a very able and carefully written treatise upon the doctrine of Apostolical Succession, but it is also a calm yet noble vindication of the validity of the Anglican Orders: it well sustains the brilliant reputation which Mr. Haddan left behind him at Oxford, and it supplements his other profound historical researches in ecclesiastical matters. This book will remain for a long time the classic work upon English Orders."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"A very temperate, but a very well reasoned book."—WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

"Mr. Haddan ably sustains his reputation throughout the work. His style is clear, his inferences are reasonable, and the publication is especially well-timed in prospect of the coming Ecumenical Council."—CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY GAZETTE.

A MANUAL FOR THE SICK; with other Devotions. By LANCELOT ANDREWS, D.D., sometime Lord Bishop of Winchester. Edited with a Preface by H. P. LIDDON, M.A. Large type. With Portrait. Third Edition. 24mo. 2s. 6d.

HELP AND COMFORT FOR THE SICK FCCR. By the Author of "Sickness; its Trials and Blessings." New Edition. Small 8vo. 1s.

CURIOUS MYTHS OF THE MIDDLE AGES. By S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Author of "Post-Medieval Preachers," &c. With Illustrations. New Edition. Complete in One Vol. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"These Essays will be found to have something to satisfy most classes of readers; the lovers of legends proper, the curious in popular delusions, the initiated in Darwinian and Monoddoan theories; and if, in the chapters on Tell and Gellert, we are a little struck with the close following of Dasent's track, in his preface to the Norse tales, it must be owned that there are chapters—e.g., those on the Divining Rod, the Man in the Moon, and the Seven Sleepers—which present new matter, and deserve the praise of independent research."

—QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"The author, indeed, is, sometimes fanciful and overbold in his conclusions; but he conducts us through marvellous ways—ways which he has studied well before he undertook to guide others; and if we do not always acquiesce in his descriptions or arguments, we seldom differ from him without hesitation."—ATHENÆUM.

"We have no space to linger longer about a book which, apart from its didactic pretensions, is an exceedingly amusing and interesting collection of old stories and legends of the middle ages."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"That, on his first visit to the varied field of mediæval mythology, Mr. Baring-Gould should have culled as samples of its richness the most brilliant of the flowers that bloomed in it, is scarcely to be wondered at. But it shows how fertile is the soil when he is enabled to cull from it so goodly a second crop as that which he here presents to us. The myths treated of in the present volume vary in interest—they are all curious and well worth reading."—NOTES AND QUERIES.

LETTERS FROM ROME ON THE COUNCIL. By QUIRINUS.

Reprinted from the "Allgemeine Zeitung." Authorized Translation. Crown 8vo. 12s.

THE POPE AND THE COUNCIL. By JANUS. Authorized translation from the German. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"A profound and learned treatise, evidently the work of one of the first theologians of the day, discussing with the scientific fulness and precision proper to German investigation, the great doctrinal questions expected to come before the Council, and especially the proposed dogma of Papal Infallibility. There is probably no work in existence that contains at all, still less within so narrow a compass, so complete a record of the origin and growth of the infallibilist theory, and of all the facts of Church history bearing upon it, and that too in a form so clear and concise as to put the argument within the reach of any reader of ordinary intelligence, while the scrupulous accuracy of the writer, and his constant reference to the original authorities for every statement liable to be disputed, makes the monograph as a whole a perfect storehouse of valuable information for the historical or theological student."—SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Beginning with a sketch of the errors and contradictions of the Popes, and of the position which, as a matter of history, they held in the early Church, the book proceeds to describe the three great forgeries by which the Papal claims were upheld—the Isidorian decretals, the donation of Constantine, and the decretum of Gratian. The last subject ought to be carefully studied by all who wish to understand the frightful tyranny of a complicated system of laws, devised not for the protection of a people, but as instruments for grinding them to subjection. Then, after an historical outline of the general growth of the Papal power in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the writers enter upon the peculiarly episcopal and clerical question, pointing out how marvellously every little chance worked in one direction, invariably tending to throw the rule of the Church into the power of Rome; and how the growth of new institutions, like the monastic orders and the Inquisition, gradually withdrew the conduct of affairs from the Bishops of the Church in general, and consolidated the Papal influence. For all this, however, unless we could satisfy ourselves with a mere magnified table of contents, the reader must be referred to the book itself, in which he will find the interest sustained without flagging to the end."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"In France, in Holland, and in Germany there has already appeared a multitude of disquisitions on this subject. Among these several are the acknowledged compositions of men of high standing in the Roman Catholic world,—men admittedly entitled to speak with the authority that must attach to established reputation: but not one of them has hitherto produced a work more likely to create a deep impression than the anonymous German publication at the head of this notice. It is not a piece of merely polemical writing, it is a treatise dealing with a large subject in an impressive though partisan manner, a treatise grave in tone, solid in matter, and bristling with forcible and novel illustrations."—SPECTATOR.

"Rumour will, no doubt, be busy with its conjectures as to the name which lurks beneath the nom de plume of 'Janus.' We do not intend to offer any contribution towards the elucidation of the mystery, unless it be a contribution to say that the book bears internal evidence of being the work of a Catholic, and that there are not many Catholics in Europe who could have written it. Taking it all in all, it is no exaggerated praise to characterize it as the most damaging assault on Ultramontaniam that has appeared in modern times. Its learning is copious and complete, yet so admirably arranged that it invariably illustrates without overlaying the argument. The style is clear and simple, and there is no attempt at rhetoric. It is a piece of cool and masterly dissection, all the more terrible for the passionless manner in which the author conducts the operation."—TIMES.

LIFE, JOURNALS, AND LETTERS OF HENRY ALFORD, D.D., late Dean of Canterbury. Edited by his WIDOW. Third and Cheaper Edition, with Portrait and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 9s.

"The Life of Dean Alford will have a far more general interest than that of many more conspicuous theologians. . . . His life is written by his widow, and we need scarcely say that it was a difficult and delicate task for a wife to undertake. On the whole, Mrs. Alford has acquitted herself admirably. . . . His life was the best commentary on his character, and the remarks we have made or quoted as we have gone along leave us little more to add. Those who desire thoroughly to appreciate a valuable life and a beautiful character we refer to the volume itself."—TIMES.

"It was a beautiful life he lived; and touchingly beautiful in its unadorned simplicity is the record given to us in this volume by his life-long companion, who from his early boyhood had shared his every thought. . . . The real value of the memoir is that it gives us so attractive a portrait of its subject. Of this too much can hardly be said. The goodness, the piety, the calm thankfulness, the ready submission, the charity breathing in every line, is unmistakable. And it is this that makes the book so attractive."—GUARDIAN.

"We have here the simple and loving record of a happy, industrious, and holy life.

To have known and valued Henry Alford will long be a source of heartfelt satisfaction to many others, besides those immediate friends whose names are linked with his in this beautiful and touching Life by his widow."—SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Here is a book of rare interest, the editing of which bears evidence not only of loving affection, as was natural, but of great care; and happily so many of Dean Alford's letters are given that one has a real insight into his own feelings."—JOHN BULL.

"No elaborate memoir from the pen of even his most intimate friend could give a truer insight or reflect more clearly the beautiful traits of Alford's inner character, with all the subdued and Christian sweetness which seems to have characterized the late Dean of Canterbury from his very earliest years, than these daily 'Experiences,' indited by his own hands."—SCOTSMAN.

"We must refer our readers to the volume for its incidents, and for very much that will enhance their admiration and their thankfulness to God that such a life has been lived. The memoir has been compiled by his widow in a spirit in perfect sympathy with his own."—BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"A thoroughly sound and valuable manual."—CHURCH TIMES.

"To us it appears that Mr. Blunt has succeeded very well. All necessary information seems to be included, and the arrangement is excellent."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

A KEY TO CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE AND PRACTICE FOUNDED ON THE CHURCH CATECHISM. By the Rev. JOHN HENRY BLUNT, M.A. New Edition. Small 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"Of cheap and reliable text-books of this nature there has hitherto been a great want. We are often asked to recommend books for use in Church Sunday-schools, and we therefore take this opportunity of saying that we know of none more likely to be of service both to teachers and scholars than these 'Keys.'"—CHURCHMAN'S SHILLING MAGAZINE.

"This is another of Mr. Blunt's most useful manuals, with all the precision of a school book, yet diverging into matters of practical application so freely as to make it most serviceable, either as a teacher's suggestion book, or as an intelligent pupil's reading book."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"Will be very useful for the higher classes in Sunday-schools, or rather for the fuller instruction of the Sunday-school teachers themselves, where the parish priest is wise enough to devote a certain time regularly to their preparation for their voluntary task."—UNION REVIEW.

"Another of the many useful books on theological and Scriptural subjects which have been written by the Rev. John Henry Blunt. The present is entitled 'A Key to Christian Doctrine and Practice, founded on the Church Catechism,' and will take its place as an elementary text-book upon the Creed in our schools and colleges. The Church Catechism is clearly and fully explained by the author in this 'Key.' Numerous references, Scriptural and otherwise, are scattered about the book."—PUBLIC OPINION.

A KEY TO THE KNOWLEDGE OF CHURCH HISTORY. (Ancient.) Edited by JOHN HENRY BLUNT, M.A. New Edition. Small 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"It offers a short and condensed account of the origin, growth, and condition of the Church in all parts of the world, from A.D. 1 down to the end of the fifteenth century. Mr. Blunt's first object has been conciseness, and this has been admirably carried out, and to students of Church history this feature will readily recommend itself. As an elementary work 'A Key' will be specially valuable, inasmuch as it points out certain definite lines of thought, by which those who enjoy the opportunity may be guided in reading the statements of more elaborate histories. At the same time it is but fair to Mr. Blunt to remark that, for general readers, the little volume contains everything that could be consistently expected in a volume of its character. There are many notes, theological, scriptural, and historical, and the 'get up' of the book is specially commendable. As a text-book for the higher forms of schools the work will be acceptable to numerous teachers."—PUBLIC OPINION.

"It contains some concise notes on Church History, compressed into a small compass, and we think it is likely to be useful as a book of reference."—JOHN BULL.

"A very terse and reliable collection of the main facts and incidents connected with Church History."—ROCK.

"It will be excellent, either for school or home use, either as a reading or as a reference book, on all the main facts and names and controversies of the first fifteen centuries. It is both well arranged and well written."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

A KEY TO THE KNOWLEDGE OF CHURCH HISTORY
(Modern). Edited by the Rev. JOHN HENRY BLUNT, M.A. Small 8vo.
2s. 6d.

By JOHN PILKINGTON NORRIS, M.A., Canon of Bristol, formerly one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools.

New Edition. Small 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"This is very much the best book of its kind we have seen. The only fault is its shortness, which prevents its going into the details which would support and illustrate its statements, and which in the process of illustrating them would fix them upon the minds and memories of its readers. It is, however, a great improvement upon any book of its kind we know. It bears all the marks of being the condensed work of a real scholar, and of a divine too. The bulk of the book is taken up with a 'Life of Christ' compiled from the Four Gospels so as to exhibit its steps and stages and salient points. The rest of the book consists of independent chapters on special points."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"This book is no ordinary compendium, no mere 'cram-book'; still less is it an ordinary reading book for schools; but the schoolmaster, the Sunday-school teacher, and the seeker after a comprehensive knowledge of Divine truth will find it worthy of its name. Canon Norris writes simply, reverently, without great display of learning, giving the result of much careful study in a short compass, and adorning the subject by the tenderness and honesty with which he treats it. . . . We hope that this little book will have a very wide circulation and that it will be studied; and we can promise that those who take it up will not readily put it down again."—RECORD.

"This is a golden little volume. Having often to criticise unsparingly volumes published by Messrs. Rivington, and bearing the deep High Church brand, it is the greater satisfaction to be able to commend this book so emphatically. Its design is exceedingly modest. Canon Norris writes primarily to help 'younger students' in studying the Gospels. But this unpretending volume is one which all students may study with advantage. It is an admirable manual for those who take Bible Classes through the Gospels. Closely sifted in style, so that all is clear and weighty; full of unostentatious learning, and pregnant with suggestion; deeply reverent in spirit, and altogether Evangelical in spirit; Canon Norris' book supplies a real want, and ought to be welcomed by all earnest and devout students of the Holy Gospels."—LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.

A KEY TO THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. By JOHN PILKINGTON NORRIS, M.A.

New Edition. Small 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"It is a remarkably well-written and interesting account of its subject, 'The Book of the Acts,' giving us the narrative of St. Luke with exactly what we want in the way of connecting links and illustrations. One most notable and praiseworthy characteristic of the book is its candour. . . . The book is one which we can heartily recommend."—SPECTATOR.

"Of Canon Norris's 'Key to the Narrative of the Four Gospels,' we wrote in high approval not many months ago. The present is not less carefully prepared, and is full of the unostentatious results of sound learning and patient thought."—LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"This little volume is one of a series of 'Keys' of a more or less educational character, which are in the course of publication by Messrs. Rivington. It gives apparently a very fair and tolerably exhaustive résumé of the contents of the Acts, with which it deals, not chapter by chapter, but consecutively in the order of thought."—SCHOOL BOARD CHRONICLE.

"Few books have ever given us more un-mixed pleasure than this. It is faultlessly written, so that it reads as pleasantly and enticingly as if it had not the least intention of being an 'educational' book. It is complete and exhaustive, so far as the narrative and all its bearings go, so that students may feel that they need not be hunting up other books to supply the lacunæ. It is the work of a classical scholar, and it leaves nothing wanting in the way of classical illustrations, which in the case of the Acts are of special importance. And, lastly, it is theologically sound."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"This is a sequel to Canon Norris's 'Key to the Gospels,' which was published two years ago, and which has become a general favourite with those who wish to grasp the leading features of the life and word of Christ. The sketch of the Acts of the Apostles is done in the same style; there is the same reverent spirit and quiet enthusiasm running through it, and the same instinct for seizing the leading points in the narrative."—RECORD.

RIVINGTON'S DEVOTIONAL SERIES.

Elegantly printed with red borders. 16mo. 2s. 6d. each.

THOMAS À KEMPIS, OF THE IMITATION OF CHRIST.

Also a Cheap Edition, without the red borders, 1s., or in Cover, 6d.

"A very beautiful edition. We commend it to the Clergy as an excellent gift-book for teachers and other workers."—CHURCH TIMES.

"This work is a precious relic of mediæval times, and will continue to be valued by every section of the Christian Church."—WEEKLY REVIEW.

"A beautifully printed pocket edition of this marvellous production of a man, who, out of the dark mists of popery, saw so much of experimental religion. Those who are well grounded in evangelical truth may use it with profit."—RECORD.

"A very cheap and handsome edition."—ROCK.

"This new edition is a marvel of cheapness."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"Beautifully printed, and very cheap editions of this long-used hand-book of devotion."—LITERARY WORLD.

THE RULE AND EXERCISES OF HOLY LIVING. By

JEREMY TAYLOR, D.D., Bishop of Down and Connor, and Dromore.

Also a Cheap Edition, without the red borders, 1s.

THE RULE AND EXERCISES OF HOLY DYING. By

JEREMY TAYLOR, D.D., Bishop of Down and Connor, and Dromore.

Also a Cheap Edition, without the red borders, 1s.

The 'HOLY LIVING' and the 'HOLY DYING' may be had bound together in One Volume, 5s.; or without the red borders, 2s. 6d.

"An extremely well-printed and well got up edition, as pretty and graceful as possible, and yet not too fine for real use. We wish the devotions of this beautiful book were more commonly used."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"We must admit that there is a want of helps to spiritual life amongst us. Our age is so secular, and in religious movements so bustling, that it is to be feared the inner life is too often forgotten. Our public teachers may, we are sure, gain by consulting books which show how contentedness and self-renunciation may be increased; and in which the pathology of all human affections is treated with a fulness not common in our theological class rooms."—FREEMAN.

"The publishers have done good service by the production of these beautiful editions of works, which will never lose their preciousness to devout Christian spirits. It is not necessary for us to say a word as to their intrinsic merits; we have only to testify to the good taste, judgment, and care shown in these editions. They are extremely beautiful in typography and in the general getting up."—ENGLISH INDEPENDENT.

"We ought not to conclude our notice of recent devotional books, without mentioning to our readers the above new, elegant, and cheap reprint, which we trust will never be out of date or out of favour in the English branch of the Catholic Church."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"These manuals of piety written by the pen of the most beautiful writer and the most impressive divine of the English Church, need no commendation from us. They are known to the world, read in all lands, and translated, we have heard, into fifty different languages. For two centuries they have fed the faith of thousands upon thousands of souls, now we trust happy with their God, and perhaps meditating in Heaven with gratitude on their celestial truths, kindled in their souls by a writer who was little short of being inspired."—ROCK.

"These little volumes will be appreciated as presents of inestimable value."—PUBLIC OPINION.

"Either separate or bound together, may be had these two standard works of the great divine. A good edition very tastefully printed and bound."—RECORD.

A SHORT AND PLAIN INSTRUCTION FOR THE BETTER

UNDERSTANDING OF THE LORD'S SUPPER; to which is annexed the Office of the Holy Communion, with proper Helps and Directions. By THOMAS WILSON, D.D., late Lord Bishop of Sodor and Man. Complete Edition, in large type.

Also a Cheap Edition, without the red borders, 1s., or in Cover, 6d.

"The Messrs. Rivington have published a new and unabridged edition of that deservedly popular work, Bishop Wilson on the Lord's

INTRODUCTION TO THE DEVOUT LIFE. From the French of SAINT FRANCIS of Sales, Bishop and Prince of Geneva. A New Translation.

"A very beautiful edition of S. Francis de Sales' 'Devout Life': a prettier little edition for binding, type, and paper, of a very great book is not often seen."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"The translation is a good one, and the volume is beautifully got up. It would serve admirably as a gift book to those who are able to appreciate so spiritual a writer as St. Francis."—CHURCH TIMES.

"It has been the food and hope of countless souls ever since its first appearance two centuries and a half ago, and it still ranks with Scupoli's 'Compendio Spirituale,' and Arvisenet's 'Memoriale Vitæ Sacerdotalis,' as among the very best works of ascetic theology. We are glad to commend this careful and convenient version to our readers. — UNION REVIEW.

"We should be curious to know by how many different hands 'The Devout Life' of S. Francis de Sales had been translated into English. At any rate, its popularity is so great that Messrs. Rivington have just issued another translation of it. The style is good, and the volume is of a most convenient size." — JOHN BULL.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE CONCERNING EVIL THOUGHTS: wherein their Nature, Origin, and Effect are distinctly considered and explained, with many Useful Rules for restraining and suppressing such Thoughts; suited to the various conditions of Life, and the several tempers of Mankind, more especially of melancholy Persons. By WILLIAM CHILCOT, M.A.

"An elegant edition of an old devotional manual by a clergyman who was a rector in Exeter at the beginning of the last century. It seems to contain a great deal of valuable truth as to the sources of evil thoughts and the mode in which they may be expressed."—ENGLISH INDEPENDENT.

"The book is worthy of a careful perusal, and is one which once known is likely to be recurrd to again and again, a characteristic not always to be met with in works of our own day."—RECORD.

Messrs. Rivington have done all that publishers could do to give strengthening matter a cheerful form."—CHURCH REVIEW.

THE ENGLISH POEMS OF GEORGE HERBERT, together with his Collection of Proverbs, entitled JACULA PRUDENTUM.

"This beautiful little volume will be found specially convenient as a pocket manual. The 'Jacula Prudentum' or proverbs, deserve to be more widely known than they are at present. In many copies of George Herbert's writings these quaint sayings have been unfortunately omitted."—ROCK.

"George Herbert is too much a household name to require any introduction. It will be sufficient to say that Messrs. Rivington have published a most compact and convenient edition of the poems and proverbs of this illustrious English divine."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

"An exceedingly pretty edition, the most attractive form we have yet seen from this delightful author, as a gift-book."—UNION REVIEW.

"A very beautiful edition of the quaint old English bard. All lovers of the 'Holy' Herbert will be grateful to Messrs. Rivington for the care and pains they have bestowed in supplying them with this and withal convenient copy of poems so well known and so deservedly prized."—LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"A very tasteful little book, and will doubtless be acceptable to many."—RECORD.

"We commend this little book heartily to our readers. It contains Herbert's English poems and the 'Jacula Prudentum,' in a very neat volume which does much credit to the publishers; it will, we hope, meet with extensive circulation as a choice gift-book at a moderate price."—CHRISTIAN OBSERVER.

THE CHRISTIAN YEAR: Thoughts in Verse for the Sundays and Holy Days throughout the Year. Elegantly printed with red borders, 16mo. 2s. 6d. Cheap edition without the red borders, limp cloth, 1s.; or in paper cover, 6d.

NEW THEOLOGICAL DICTIONARY.

DICTIONARY OF DOCTRINAL AND HISTORICAL THEOLOGY. By various writers. Edited by the Rev. JOHN HENRY BLUNT, M.A., F.S.A. Editor of the Annotated Book of Common Prayer. Second Edition.

Complete in one volume of 833 pages, imperial 8vo (equal to six 8vo volumes of 400 pages each), and printed in large readable type, 42s., or half-bound in morocco, 52s. 6d.

I. NATURE OF THE WORK. This Dictionary consists of a series of original Essays (alphabetically arranged, and 575 in number) on all the principal subjects connected with the Doctrines of the Christian Church. Some idea of the subjects, and of the length of the articles, may be formed from the following titles of those which occupy the work from page 700 to page 720.

SIGN.	SPINOZISM.	SUFFRAGAN.
SIMONY.	SPIRIT.	SUNDAY.
SIN.	SPIRIT, THE HOLY.	SUPEREROGATION.
SINAITIC CODEX.	SPONSORS.	SUPERNATURAL.
SOCINIANISM.	SUBDEACONS.	SUPERSTITION.
SOLIFIDIANISM.	SUBLAPSARIANISM.	SUPRALAPSARIANISM.
SOUL.	SUBSTANCE.	SUPREMACY, PAPAL.

2. OBJECT OF THE WORK. The writers of all the Essays have endeavoured to make them sufficiently exhaustive to render it unnecessary for the majority of readers to go further for information, and, at the same time, sufficiently suggestive of more recondite sources of Theological study, to help the student in following up his subjects. By means of a Table prefixed to the Dictionary, a regular course of such study may be carried out in its pages.

3. PRINCIPLES OF THE WORK. The Editor and his coadjutors have carefully avoided any party bias, and consequently the work cannot be said to be either "High Church," "Low Church," or "Broad Church." The only bias of the Dictionary is that given by Revelation, History, Logic, and the literary idiosyncrasy of each particular contributor. But the Editor has not attempted to assist the circulation of the book by making it colourless on the pretence of impartiality. Errors are freely condemned, and truths are expressed as if they were worth expressing; but he believes that no terms of condemnation which may be used ever transgress the bounds of Christian courtesy.

4. PART OF A SERIES. The Dictionary of Theology is complete in itself, but it is also intended to form part of a Series, entitled, "A Summary of Theology," of which the second volume, "A Dictionary of Sects, Heresies, and Schools of Thought," is in the press.

"Taken as a whole the articles are the work of practised writers, and well informed and solid theologians. . . . We know no book of its size and bulk which supplies the information here given at all; far less which supplies it in an arrangement so accessible, with a completeness of information so thorough, and with an ability in the treatment of profound subjects so great. Dr. Hook's most useful volume is a work of high calibre, but it is the work of a single mind. We have here a wider range of thought from a greater variety of sides. We have here also the work of men who evidently know what they write about, and are somewhat more profound (to say the least), than the writers of the current Dictionaries of Sects and Heresies."—GUARDIAN.

"More antiquarianism, however interesting, has little place in it. But for all practical purposes its historical articles are excellent. They are of course, and of necessity, a good deal condensed, yet they are wonderfully complete; see for example such articles as 'Atheism,' 'Cabbala,' 'Calvinism,' 'Canonization,' 'Convocations,' 'Evangelical,' 'Fathers,' 'Infant Baptism,' &c., &c. But the strength of the book lies in the theology proper, and herein more particularly in what one may call the metaphysical side of doctrine;—see the articles on 'Conceptualism,' 'Doubt,' 'Dualism,' 'Election,' 'Eternity,' 'Everlasting Punishment,' 'Fatalism,' and the like. We mention these as characteristic of the book. At the same time other more practical matters are fully dealt with. There are excellent and elaborate papers on such words as 'Eucharist,' 'Confession,' 'Blood,' 'Cross,' 'Antichrist,' to say nothing of the host of minor matters on which it is most convenient to be able to turn to a book which gives you at a glance the pith of a whole library in a column or a page. Thus it will be obvious that it takes a very much wider range than any undertaking of the same kind in our language; and that to those of our clergy who have not the fortune to spend in books, and would not have the leisure to use them if they possessed them, it will be the most serviceable and reliable substitute for a large library we can think of. And in many cases, while keeping strictly within its province as a Dictionary, it contrives to be marvellously suggestive of thought and reflections, which a serious minded man will take with him and ponder over for his own elaboration and future use. As an example of this we may refer to the whole article on Doubt. It is treated of under the successive heads of,—(1) its nature; (2) its origin; (3) the history of the principal periods of Doubt; (4) the consciousness—or actual experience of Doubt, and how to deal with its different phases and kinds; (5) the relations of Doubt to action and to belief. To explain a little we will here quote a paragraph or two, which may not be unacceptable to our readers. . . . The variety of the references given in the course of this article, and at its conclusion, show how carefully the writer has thought out and studied his subject in its various manifestations in many various minds, and illustrate very forcibly how much reading goes to a very small amount of space in anything worth the name of 'Dictionary of Theology.' We trust most sincerely that the book may be largely used. For a present to a clergyman on his ordination, or from a parishioner to his pastor, it would be most appropriate. It may indeed be called 'a box of tools for a working clergyman.'—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"Seldom has an English work of equal magnitude been so permeated with Catholic instincts, and at the same time seldom has a work on theology been kept so free from the drift of rhetorical incrustation. Of course it is not meant that all these remarks apply in their full extent to every article. In a great Dictionary there are compositions, as in a great house there are vessels, of various kinds. Some of these at a future day may be replaced by others more substantial in their build, more proportionate in their outline, and more elaborate in their detail. But admitting all this, the whole remains a home to which the student will constantly recur, sure to find spacious chambers, substantial furniture, and (which is most important) no stinted light."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"The second and final instalment of Mr. Blunt's useful Dictionary, itself but a part of a more comprehensive plan, is now before the public, and fully sustains the mainly favourable impression created by the appearance of the first part. Within the sphere it has marked out for itself, no equally useful book of reference exists in English for the elucidation of theological problems. . . . Entries which display much care, research, and judgment in compilation, and which will make the task of the parish priest who is brought face to face with any of the practical questions which they involve far easier than has been hitherto. The very fact that the utterances are here and there somewhat more guarded and hesitating than quite accords with our judgment, is a gain in so far as it protects the work from the charge of inculcating extreme views, and will thus secure its admission in many places where moderation is accounted the crowning grace."—CHURCH TIMES.

"The writers who are at work on it are scholars and theologians, and earnest defenders of the Christian faith. They evidently hold fast the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and have the religious instruction of the rising ministry at heart. Moreover, their scheme is a noble one; it does credit not only to their learning and zeal, but also to their tact and discretion."—LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"Infinitely the best book of the kind in the language; and, if not the best conceivable, it is perhaps the best we are ever likely to see within its compass as to size and scope. Accurate and succinct in statement, it may safely be trusted as a handbook as regards facts, while in our judgment, this second part still maintains the character we gave the first, namely, of showing most ability in its way of treating the more abstract and metaphysical side of theological questions. The liturgical articles also in this part deserve especial mention. The book is sure to make its own way by sheer force of usefulness."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"It is not open to doubt that this work, of which the second and concluding part has just been issued, is in every sense a valuable and important one. Mr. Blunt's Dictionary is a most acceptable addition to English theological literature. Its general style is terse and vigorous. Whilst its pages are free from wordiness, there is none of that undue condensation which, under the plea of judicious brevity, veils a mere empty jotting down of familiar statements (and mis-statements), at second or, it may be, third hand from existing works. Dean Hook's well-known Dictionary makes the nearest approach to the one now before us, but Mr. Blunt's is decidedly the better of the two."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

"It will be found of admirable service to all students of theology, as advancing and maintaining the Church's views on all subjects as fall within the range of fair argument and inquiry. It is not often that a work of so comprehensive and so profound a nature is marked to the very end by so many signs of wide and careful research, sound criticism, and well-founded and well-expressed belief."—STANDARD.

A GLOSSARY OF ECCLESIASTICAL TERMS. Containing Brief Explanations of Words used in Theology, Liturgiology, Chronology, Law, Architecture, Antiquities, Symbolism, Greek Hierology and Mediaeval Latin; together with some account of Titles of our Lord, Emblems of Saints, Hymns, Orders, Heresies, Ornaments, Offices, Vestments and Ceremonial, and Miscellaneous Subjects. By Various Writers. Edited by the Rev. ORBY SHIPLEY, M.A. Crown 8vo. 18s.

A HANDY BOOK OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL DILAPIDATIONS ACT, 1871. With the Amendment Act, 1872. With Remarks on the Qualification and Practice of Diocesan Surveyors. By EDWARD G. BRUTON, F.R.I.B.A., and Diocesan Surveyor, Oxford. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.

LIFE IN THE WORLD; being a Selection from Sermons preached at St. Luke's, Berwick Street. By the Rev. HARRY JONES, M.A., Rector of St. George-in-the-East. Second Edition. Small 8vo. 5s.

THE PERFECT MAN; or, Jesus an Example of Godly Life. By the Rev. HARRY JONES, M.A., Rector of St. George-in-the-East. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SKETCHES OF THE RITES AND CUSTOMS OF THE GRECO-RUSSIAN CHURCH. By H. C. ROMANOFF. With an Introductory Notice by the Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"The twofold object of this work is 'to present the English with correct descriptions of the ceremonies of the Greco-Russian Church, and at the same time with pictures of domestic life in Russian homes, especially those of the clergy and the middle class of nobles;' and, beyond question, the author's labour has been so far successful that, whilst her Church scenes may be commended as a series of most dramatic and picturesque tableaux, her social sketches enable us to look at certain points beneath the surface of Russian life, and materially enlarge our knowledge of a country concerning which we have still a very great deal to learn."—ATHENÆUM.

"The volume before us is anything but a formal liturgical treatise. It might be more valuable to a few scholars if it were, but it would certainly fail to obtain perusal at the hands of the great majority of those whom the writer, not unreasonably, hopes to attract by the narrative style she has adopted. What she has set before us is a series of brief outlines, which, by their simple effort to clothe the information given us in a living garb, reminds us of a once-popular child's book which we remember a generation ago, called 'Sketches of Human Manners.'"—CHURCH TIMES.

THE ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF RELIGIOUS BELIEF. By S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Author of "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages."

Vol. I. MONOTHEISM and POLYTHEISM. Second Edition. 8vo. 15s.

Vol. II. CHRISTIANITY. 8vo. 15s.

THE FIRST HEBREW BOOK. By T. K. ARNOLD, M.A. Third Edition. 12mo. 7s. 6d. Key, 3s. 6d.
